Negotiations under way to bring Ticketmaster to K-State

BRENNALY
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State Union Bookstore might house a Ticketmaster ticket outlet sometime soon.

The university doesn't have a contract with Ticketmaster yet, said John Nieman, general manager of Ticketmaster Midwest Inc., who is working on a contract with K-State.

Carrie Mitchell, book division manager at the Union Bookstore, said staff at Streetside Records recommended the Union Bookstore as a good location for a ticket outlet when they decided to end their agreement with Ticketmaster.

Trent Smith, sales specialist at Streetside, said there was a lack of give and take between the two businesses.

Streetside had to sign a contract that didn't allow them to sell any other local tickets for a profit, Smith said. "We wanted to be a part of the community and help sell those tickets as well."

Despite past experiences Streetside had with Ticketmaster, Mitchell said the bookstore's ticket outlet will be beneficial.

"It's unfair not to have an outlet, and a lot of what the bookstore is service. From what I know, we will never lose money in the agreement," she said.

Mitchell said tickets will likely be available at the service counter on the Union's first floor within the next two months.

"We used to sell the McCain and athletic tickets there, so that's why we thought we'd be a natural outlet," she said.

One change patrons will have to make is the hours they will be able to buy tickets. Streetside is open later than the Union Bookstore.

"Streetside was open later," Mark Spears, sophomore in horticulture, said. "It would be nice if the bookstore had later hours."

So far, there are no plans to change the Union Bookstore's hours, Mitchell said.

Mendy Smith, graduate student in biology, said she thought the new ticket outlet would be more convenient.

"It will be accessible to students and a larger variety of people. I'll probably remember to stop by there," she said.

Spears said it would be easier to have an outlet in the K-State Student Union than to not have a place in Manhattan. He said he wanted to buy concert tickets in Manhattan, but had to have a friend in another city buy the tickets for him.

"It's turned out to be a huge ordeal," Spears said.

"Since Streetside stopped, it's been a real hassle."

After almost 40 years of telephone use, a 200-foot tall Southwestern Bell Telephone Company microwave tower stands no more.

Wednesday evening, after months of attempts, crews contracted by the American Institute of Baking dismantled the tower.

Last fall, the institute purchased the tower property, which sits adjacent to the baking institute building at 1213 Baker's Way.

With the invention of fiber optic cables, the tower's technology became obsolete. Southwestern Bell used the tower until the middle of last year and sold the lot to the institute.

"We've been working to have it brought down the last few months," said Paul Klover, vice president of administrations at the institute. "It's really been a weather-permitting project. People have been climbing the tower the last week working to get it ready to dismantle."

First the top 100 feet were pulled over, landing east of the tower base. Then, the remaining portion was taken down. The metal from the tower will be scrapped.

For now, the lot will stand empty. "At this time, we don't have specific needs for the property," Klover said. "We purchased it in case we needed it for future expansion."

Gary Harmon, employee of Nationwide Towers of Henderson, Ky., walks away from the falling microwave tower Wednesday at the American Institute of Baking.

Students participate in study program

KELLY DICKSON
Kansas State Collegian

Nontraditional students no longer have to attend classes on campus to obtain a degree, if they are part of K-State's Nontraditional Study Program.

K-State's Nontraditional Study Program is offered through the Division of Continuing Education. The program began in 1974, and its numbers have increased from 25 to 30 students in the 70s to 232 students this semester.

Degrees are offered in social sciences, animal sciences and industry, and dietetics. Dietetics is only offered in Kansas. The program offers master's degree sequences in engineering and in agribusiness, a new option started this January. Nontraditional Study Program also allows students to take classes as electives or courses needed to finish other degrees.

"Our long tradition with distance learning started with correspondence classes in the early 1900s. The continued success and growth of the program is because of affordability and convenience," Cynthia Trent, program coordinator, said.

Ann Conyers and Alicia Ralford, senior and junior in social sciences, respectively, both started their academic careers at K-State. Conyers attended K-State through December 1985 when her husband went on active duty in the military. She has taken classes from Fort Jackson in South Carolina and her present home at Fort Benny, in Columbus, Ga.

"It is a great way to finish for a working mom. You already feel guilty enough about leaving your kids in day care all day, you don't want to put them there at night. I always study after the kids go to bed or early in the morning," Conyers said.

Ralford had a different story about how she ended up in the Nontraditional Study Program at K-State.

"I was raised 15 miles from Manhattan and came to K-State. I was one of a lucky few, actually lucky many, who got pregnant their freshman year," she said.

The Ralfords decided her husband would finish school while she went to night school. Problems with teachers who did not understand her situation led to Ralford quitting night school. She wanted to continue school, so she chose Nontraditional Study Program.

Another reason Ralford chose the Nontraditional Study Program was because of the cost of attending the University of Michigan, the school geographically nearest her home in Toledo, Ohio.

"The University of Michigan is only 35 minutes away, but the tuition is four times as much and I would have to pay for day care for my son. That $400 a month is too much when you have to pay for preschool, a car payment and have a mortgage," she said.

Another advantage for Ralford is that she was able to use her scholarships she had earned her freshman year, and the NTS program also offers scholarships for its students.

Also, nontraditional students do not have to pay fees that on-campus students pay.

"It is a lot cheaper because I don't have to pay to use Lafene or the Rec like on-campus students," Ralford said.

There are disadvantages to the Nontraditional Study Program. The form in which classes are taught can take away from the classroom setting or the social aspect of school.

"People never get to know me as a person, people can't see facial expressions. Sarcasm is a major problem. You can't hear them laughing," Ralford said.

Classes can be taken in a variety of formats: multimedia, audio or videotape; on the World Wide Web, through e-mail and mailing lists; guided study; and TELENET 2 in certain Kansas towns.

Conyers saw the lack of an on-campus library as a disadvantage, but saw advantages in the class formats.

"Everyone is more honest on e-mail. As I have progressed through my classes some students are the same. We stay in touch over e-mail," she said.

Ralford and Conyers did agree on the best aspect of the program. They said teachers understand that these students' jobs and families are the first priority.

Association, teachers promote READ week to encourage literacy, reading in classroom

Amelia Earhart is the inspiration for "Flying into the new millennium with books," this year's Reading Enriches Any Day week theme.

READ is promoted yearly by schools and teachers in Kansas under the direction of the Kansas Reading Association and is celebrated during the last full week of January.

This year's week is Jan. 26-30.

Wendy Klosterman, public relations chair for KRA, explained the purpose of READ week.

"READ week has been celebrated for many years to promote reading and literature in the classroom," she said.

Klosterman, who also teaches eighth-grade literature at Abilene Middle School, said she believes the week is important to her students' enrichment.

"Anything we can do to help promote the use of literature in students' lives is beneficial to them," she said.

To help teachers get their students involved, a list of suggested games and activities is distributed to schools by KRA. Teachers are also encouraged to create their own activities based on the READ week theme and goals.

Typical activities for the week might include setting aside class time to read silently, researching and then constructing paper airplanes, and visiting the Amelia Earhart museum in Atchison, Kan.

The idea is to show students that reading can be fun in class and out of class as well, Klosterman said.

A KRA news release asks that Kansans think about the importance of literacy and support local efforts to promote reading in communities and homes on a regular basis.

It is important that parents and communities get involved in literacy programs, Sandra Morris, president of KRA, said.

"Reading to your children gives them a great advantage," she said. It overcomes the traditional barriers of class and ethnicity, she said.

She also stressed that knowing the benefits of reading to children is especially important for college students because they are the next generation of parents and teachers.

Bills eliminating partial-birth, viable fetus abortions introduced into state Senate

TOPEKA — Two bills that would restrict abortions in Kansas were introduced Wednesday into the Senate, to the surprise of some anti-abortion lawmakers.

One would ban the procedure commonly called a partial-birth abortion. The other would ban abortions after the fetus is viable. It does not define the point at which a fetus can survive outside the womb.

Chief sponsor of the two bills, Sen. Tim Emert, R-Independence, said a conference committee working since last May had not settled on the wording of a compromise bill so it would pass constitutional.

He said he sought input from legislative staff members to keep his anti-abortion bills constitutional.

"It's as strict as you can be and be constitutional," Emert said.

The first bill defines partial-birth abortion as a procedure in which a person performing an abortion "partially vaginally delivers a living fetus before killing the fetus and completing the delivery."

It would ban the procedure, but makes an exception to save the mother's life or protect her from physical injury, and would punish abortion providers but not the mother.

The second bill would ban abortions after a fetus is viable, with an exception to preserve the life or health of the mother. It would strike an exception made for fetuses affected by severe deformities.

Gov. Bill Graves has said he wants a ban on partial-birth abortions. His spokesman, Mike Matson, said Graves could support the bill on partial-birth abortion, and was still reviewing the other bill concerning the ban after fetal viability.

Fire claims 3rd church in rural Pennsylvania; state, federal investigators look for connections

SOMERSET, Pa. — George Miller's four children were baptized at the Pike Run Church of the Brethren. His father helped build the church decades ago, hauling red bricks for miles on a sled.

In just minutes Tuesday, the 74-year-old church was destroyed by a fire authorities said was deliberately set. It was the third rural church burned by an arsonist in southwestern Pennsylvania in a week.

"Any church is open to a thing like this, but a country church is more so," said Miller, who lives near the church 60 miles southeast of Pittsburgh. Nothing — not even the bricks still standing in the south and east walls — could be saved.

"All the history's gone. She really went up," church member Darlene Crice said.

State troopers and U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms investigators were to meet Wednesday to look for connections among the fires.

All three churches had predominantly white congregations. State police wouldn't release the cause of the Pike Run fire, which caused $150,000 in damage.

Last week, arson-caused fires destroyed Barren Run United Methodist Church in West Newton and damaged Salem Baptist Church in Rostraver Township.

Barren Run burned to the ground after it was entered and torched on Jan. 20. Salem Baptist, about 10 miles from Barren Run, was spared because a passer-by smelled smoke shortly after a firebomb was thrown on Jan. 22.

At Pike Run, churchgoer Glenn Miller, who is George Miller's cousin and lives near the church, reported the blaze at about 12:45 a.m.

Some of Pike Run's 80 members called each other and quickly bundled up to watch firefighters battle the flames in the cold. Federal authorities were called because they have investigated all church fires since a series of fires at predominantly black churches in the South during the past two years.

U.S. threatens military attack; Iraq accuses U.S. of fabricating biological, chemical weapons crisis

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Iraq's foreign minister accused the United States on Wednesday of fabricating a crisis as a pretext to attack Iraq, and joined with France to criticize recent comments by the chief U.N. weapons inspector.

Foreign Minister Mohammed Saeed al-Sahhaf denounced Richard Butler, the chief U.N. weapons inspector, for telling The New York Times that Iraq's biological weapons program could blow away Tel Aviv.

"Those statements and interviews emphasized again that Mr. Butler is not a neutral expert," al-Sahhaf said. "He is biased and blindly committing mistakes, deadly mistakes."

Al-Sahhaf said Iraq had asked U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan to punish Butler for his remarks.

The inspectors repeatedly have said they suspect Iraq is hiding material from its banned weapons programs at the sites. Iraq has said it will never allow the inspectors to enter those locations.

The United States has threatened a military attack to force Iraq to comply with U.N. resolutions, and several American officials are to begin trips this week to consult with American allies about a strike.

U.N. inspectors must certify that Iraq has destroyed its weapons of mass destruction before punishing trade sanctions imposed after Iraq's 1990 invasion of Kuwait can be lifted.

Engineer tradition continues

► NEW DEAN SETS GOALS FOR ESTABLISHED COLLEGE WHILE KEEPING TRADITION.

JILL BUTLER
Kansas State Collegian

When Terry King came to K-State to become the dean of engineering, he knew he was coming to a well-established engineering school.

He came to take the place of Donald Rathbone, who served as dean of engineering for 24 years.

"No one could ever replace Dean Rathbone," King said. "Over the years, he built K-State engineering into what it is today. Every major success over the last 20 years has Dean Rathbone's imprint on it. What we are doing now is working on this solid base to raise K-State engineering to the next level of performance."

After spending 15 years at Iowa State University, King said he came to K-State to continue the tradition of K-State's engineering excellence and take the engineering program to new heights.

"I wasn't looking for the job, but someone nominated me and then I applied. That's how I got to K-State," King said.

Linda Streeter, administrative assistant to the dean of engineering and member of the dean search committee, said King was what the college was looking for.

STEVE HEBERT/KSCL

Terry King, dean of engineering, has taken over Donald Rathbone's duties. Rathbone served as the dean for 24 years.

"King just stood out," she said. "He showed strong leadership for the college and had the right vision and drive to go forward from where the college is today. He also had a very strong research program which we were also looking for."

The search committee, which consisted of current faculty, chose King over two other finalists.

"The change in administration has been a positive one," said Maureen Lockhart, who was administrative assistant to Rathbone and now works for King. "I see a similarity between the two. They both work very well with people, and I've enjoyed working with both of them."

King said he enjoyed working as a professor and also learned from his experience in the field.

"I consider one of my best qualities academics. I've learned what I know from being involved with both schools and industry," King said.

King said he is applying his knowledge of both school and industry to help make engineering at K-State better.

"We must examine curricular content and professional experiences," he said. "Engineering education must also be designed to accommodate current trends and future needs. We need to create more connections and stronger partnerships with society. We must strive for fulfillment of the college and profession."

After working with K-State students, King said K-State engineering students are similar to those of other colleges.

"The students at K-State are very hardworking, bright and way too modest compared to their contemporaries. Many students here do not know how good they are," King said. "In some ways our students have an inferiority complex until they get out there and compete with the other students. Our students do very well at all levels of competition."

Students on the College of Engineering Leadership Team are working on a program, Designing Engineering Education for the 21st Century. The program's goal is to determine where engineering education will be in the early part of the 21st century.

"Among the programs we are pursuing, one that will affect students most directly is our efforts in undergraduate education. We are firmly committed to an engineering education that is practice-oriented while firmly rooted in fundamentals, learning based, and integrative and holistic," King said. "We are continuing a tradition of becoming stronger everyday."

Manhattan, Junction City discuss expansion, improvements for 2006

KELLEE MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

City government representatives from Manhattan and Junction City met Tuesday night in the first-ever joint meeting between the cities to discuss areas of common interest.

"I think it is a good idea. We share common resources and problems," Manhattan Mayor Bruce Snead said.

Items on the agenda included expansion of Manhattan's Regional Airport, the development of a new business park, the creation of a regional visitors' center, the Land Management Institute and the proposed expansion of Kansas Highway 18.

Ken Black, airport director, reported on the upcoming improvement of the Regional Airport. Black said plans include fully certifying the airport and bringing it up to speed operationally.

A full certification of the airport would mean a three-minute response time for aircraft rescue and crash fire. Black said this is a fairly intensive response, and the requirement would be met by the proposed building of a fire station in an area northeast of the airport property. The airport is also looking at gaining additional airlines. Black said they have approached American Eagle about a non-stop flight to Dallas and TWA for a non-stop flight to St. Louis.

Black said the airport would like to accommodate Fort Riley, which currently can't move in big aircraft at the airport. To do this, Black said the airport must expand its apron space, create longer runways and taxi space. This expansion would allow three 747s to be on the ground at once. The entire improvement plan is set for completion in 2006.

Manhattan City Manager Gary Greer discussed the building of a new business park in the 190 acres near the regional airport as one of the three sites recommended.

"We are out of land in the current industrial park," Greer said.

The business park would have no rail access and would be lacking the smokestack industries of the other industrial parks.

"We are looking at the corporate side of high-tech business," he said. "I think it will benefit all communities."

The cities' representatives also discussed the possibility of building a visitor's center at the intersection of Kansas Highway 177 and Interstate 70. This corner was identified as the most desirable location in the area from an earlier study by a tri-county consultant for Geary, Riley and Pottawatomie counties.

Snead said the intersection was a good location and would serve Manhattan, Junction City, Fort Riley and Alma. There was discussion on gaining assistance from Strong City, the Z-Bar Ranch and Council Grove. The center would promote these area attractions as well as serve the Flint Hills, Konza Prairie and the Tall Grass National Preserve.

"The center would achieve an appreciation for the prairie," Manhattan City Commissioner Karen McCulloh said.

Manhattan City Commissioner Steve Hall said he was concerned about how the facility would be staffed and its hours of operation. A water source for the area would also have to be located. Local designer Doug DeMonbrun said the area would need a fuel station that motorists are familiar with, as well as being well-designed to encourage motorists to exit the freeway.

"That entrance to Manhattan has always been less than special," DeMonbrun said. "We have to be vicious and sell them something classier."

The estimated cost of the center is $2.5 million. At Manhattan's other significant entrance, Snead said expansion of K-18 from a two- to four-lane divided highway is possible near Ogden and I-70.

"The expansion is probably two years in the making, but we have raised the issue to the legislature," Snead said.

The expansion would provide access to the airport and new business park.

Course Information Program needs more definition

The goal of expanding a better network of information about faculty and courses among students through the Course Information Program is fantastic. Work done to advance this project during the pilot year has been impressive. Chris Hansen, former student body president, and Rhett Trujillo, Academic Affairs Committee chair, have campaigned to promote the success of this program.

The CIP Committee will present a preliminary fee proposal of 70 cents per student, per semester, to the Privilege Fee Committee on Feb. 2. We hope the committee, in the interest of seeing this program succeed, can answer some important questions.

What exactly would students be paying for? An additional 70 cents is a handsome chunk of change for students with a limited income. Students have limited resources, and the creation of any fee needs to be justified. Will the administration be committing financial support for the program?

The original proposal stated that the process would be administered by a third-party institutional unit comprised of faculty and students. How will participants be chosen?

Without a full commitment from Faculty Senate members, the success of the program is limited. What is the degree of their influence, before and after the guide is published?

Any system of evaluating instructors and courses can be abused by students looking for easier classes. However, students learn in different ways. Hopefully, this guide would provide an estimate of what to expect before enrollment and cut down on the volume of students who add and drop classes.

Are there less expensive ways to publish this information? The idea of revamping the course catalog and including a Web resource should also be considered.

This guide will allow students to make more informed academic choices before enrolling.

But before a 70-cent fee is passed, they need to know what they're getting into.

Political shading leaves loophole for lying

PAUL ROBBERN
Paul is a senior in chemistry and biochemistry. You can send e-mail to Paul at vlad@ksu.edu.

Slick Willy. What more can one say? Slick Willy. For so many years I've been dumbfounded by the lubricity of this political machine. Although ostensibly a down-home, devout Southern Baptist from Arkansas, who simply cared enough about his fellow Americans that he wished to serve them by taking on the responsibility of the presidency, Bill Clinton's deeds have rarely matched the rhetoric.

Or is it better said, his misdeeds never matched up with his rhetoric?

Or perhaps they have. In my opinion, shading the truth stands as one of the most repulsive abuses of the public trust imaginable. Clinton, however, has become a regular expert at the art of half-truths and precision wording.

Take, for instance, his denial of Gennifer Flowers' accusation that she and Clinton maintained a 12-year affair. His response prior to his deposition for the Paula Jones sexual harassment suit? "That's not true."

During his deposition, according to information leaked to Newsweek magazine, Clinton admitted to having had an affair with Flowers. How can this be? Precision wording my friends. Clinton simply stated that he did not have an affair with Flowers that lasted 4,380 days. His answer (in Clinton's mind) does not rule out the possibility that he maintained a relationship with Flowers that lasted 4,379 days. Or even 4,381 days. Another instance easily spotted is Clinton's "no inappropriate relationship" response to recent questions regarding his possible affair with then 21-year-old White House intern, Monica Lewinsky.

Even better are the flat out, catch-me-if-you-can "There is no relationship" responses. All right already, Slickster. We know you probably dumped her like a sack of bricks — we know that she's not welcome at the White House anymore — but WAS there a relationship?! Moreover, who has the privilege of defining inappropriate? It sounds like Jim Bakker and Barney Frank might even find some of Clinton's tastes a little too wild. So while he might truly feel that he was not involved with anything inappropriate, most will not define his alleged actions as acceptable.

Now, here's Paul's Kindergarten Level Lesson Concerning Truth, Honesty and Life.

Lesson 1: Tell the truth. If you tell one lie, you'll inevitably have to cover your trail with others.

Lesson 2: Tell the truth. (See reason above) and, for the Grand Finale, Lesson 3: Tell the truth.

Notice that suggestions one through three fail to contain any qualifying criteria such as: tight political spots, where one's misdeeds that have begun to garner attention allow for the disregard of one through three. They also fail to mention half-truths.

The Jewish culture provides us with the gem, "A half-truth is a whole lie." That nugget says so much. It's for these reasons that shading the truth is such a repulsive act. It insults the intelligence of those to whom the misinformation is passed and destroys the credibility of the person passing along the lie.

Furthermore, when done by a government official in his official governmental capacity, it violates the unspoken contract between that official and those citizens who put the official in that position.

Finally, in extreme cases such as Clinton's, his shading of the truth seems a greater perversion than any alleged actions in the West Wing.

READERSwrite

Students need to be responsible for actions

Editor,

I read Mr. Conrad's letter concerning a student's need to pay a parking ticket with considerable amusement. Conrad was very upset because a student who parked in a clearly marked "reserved" area had her car towed and was forced to pay a considerable amount of money as a result.

Presumably, this student purchased a parking permit when she came to K-State in the fall. Parking Services hands out regulations when a permit is purchased. Perhaps she should have taken a few minutes to read the regulations and would not have lost her "entire paycheck."

Another issue that needs to be addressed is taking responsibility for one's own actions. This student knew, or should have known, that she was parking illegally. Someone paid a lot of money to have that reserved stall, and if they call Parking Services and ask to have a car towed from their stall, I believe Parking Services has no option but to tow the car, whether it belongs to a student, staff member or faculty member.

One thing is very likely, in the future this student will be much more careful about where she parks. Sometimes it takes an experience like this for such an individual to realize that rules are in place for everyone, and if one doesn't follow rules, there are consequences to be paid.

Hopper's column had best of intentions

Editor,

Scott Hopper's article in Thursday's Collegian was a good one with great intentions. Unfortunately, trying to appeal to the "better nature" of the male who is prone to "take advantage" of a sexual situation will, in many cases, do little or no good.

The type of male who pursues this kind of unsavory behavior is not likely to listen to reason because he is, many times, either emotionally unstable or trying to "prove" something either to himself or his friends.

It would also appear to be very helpful to take the approach of addressing the women (or men ... because they at times find themselves in similar situations, you know) who might be in danger of unwarily placing themselves in the high risk category. Appeal to them to recognize the real dangers out there and how to be on guard and conduct themselves in a manner that will aid in protecting them from being victims.

The buddy system often works wonders because the two people can provide support and protection for each other. But if the occasion does not lend itself readily to this, then people should make every effort to keep their wits about them and be aware of their surroundings and in control at all times.

While neither approach is 100-percent effective, it would seem to this aging female (who was fortunate to have escaped a similar situation as a young woman with the help of friends) that the old cliché "a pound of prevention is worth an ounce of cure" is good to practice in this dangerous world of ours. Keeping your wits about you and not being too trusting of friends and acquaintances can most times play a significant part in staying safe.

Many young women and men (and even some of us who are older) go through life believing that nothing bad can happen to them, it only happens to the other person. That's been a constant since the beginning of time and probably will be until the end of time. However, as you obviously know very well, we can't stop trying to make people aware of the dangers just because of this.

So you and others keep right in there pitching, Hopper. If you can reach even a handful of people the domino effect will go into motion, and each person that is reached will perhaps reach two more, and so on. Keep up the campaign. Way to go.

America plays world's bully, not law officer

MARNY BURKE/Collegian

The earth shook, and the hut began to crumble. A large shockwave boomed in her ears, but now silence. The sun that was seconds ago so bright is now absent. Dust rises around her, and she begins to panic. She can't see or feel her legs to run. Maybe someone will hear her pleas for help through the rubble that has fallen around her.

"Let's bomb 'em."

"We should have never left that maniac in power."

"Why don't we finish the job!"

This seems to be the common anthem in American foreign policy. Did anyone stop to think before they formulated this opinion? Does anyone realize that people will die? Did anyone consider the strain on our already overburdened armed forces?

In our age of computers and mass communication, we forget the value of a single life. Death is desensitized, and people think of war as a large video game.

Numbers run together, and somehow a few deaths doesn't seem like a large price to pay, especially if it's the other side.

One death doesn't seem like that much in time of war, but that's because you assume you don't know that unlucky person.

Other people know that person, however, and that person had a life. A family. A job. What if that one person was you? Suddenly, the conflict doesn't seem worth it.

There are definitely times when our presence is needed around the world. In these times, soldiers are necessary, and deadly force must be used. I endorse these particular incidents, but are American troops really needed in as many places as we have them right now?

VIEWPOINT

SCOTT HOPPER
Scott is a junior in psychology. You can send e-mail to Scott at hopper@ksu.edu.

Bosnia, Japan, Cuba, Panama, Spain, Germany, Italy, England, Kuwait, Belgium, Hungary and Korea, to name a few, all have significant U.S. installations with thousands of troops. Does China have troops in as many places as we do? Does Russia?

I believe America to be the world's bully, not a police officer. It has become too easy in America to say, "We'll send a peace-keeping force." There has to be a line drawn. Besides, most of the people that are making these decisions don't have to spend a year on the demilitarized zone. I might have to.

I never wonder why relations between the United States and other nations begin to falter. Our culture bombards every nation in the world, so it seems we would like every nation to be American.

Fast food, music, movies and clothing have all become icons of capitalism around the world. Along with our occupation of many nations previously mentioned, the picture is complete.

To show it in reverse roles, say Japan had three military bases around Kansas.

Their soldiers don't speak your language and don't respect your culture. They have a reputation of causing trouble in the bars of your town, and they have been stationed there for more than 50 years.

Understand why other countries want us to leave?

American troops are sometimes needed to fight in different parts of the world. We are in peacetime, however, and the volume of troops abroad is astounding. Take care of our own first, and stop interfering with the internal problems of other nations.

The U.S. armed forces is so spread out, if a real war were to erupt, America would be in severe trouble.

Death is real, and a single loss is too much. Nobody really understands that concept until it happens to them or their family.

Let's reconsider our involvements around the world and stop picking fights.

What goes around comes around, and it will eventually catch up to every schoolyard bully.

SPORTS ROUND-UP

Sports Round-up is your daily dose of the latest scores, stats and news from the world of sports outside of K-State. Compiled from Associated Press reports.

No. 5 Kansas 94, Baylor 47

LAWRENCE — Raef LaFrentz, playing his second game after missing nine because of a broken finger, had 21 points and 11 rebounds to lead No. 5 Kansas to a 94-47 victory over Baylor on Wednesday night.

Billy Thomas and Kenny Gregory each had 18 points for the Jayhawks (23-3, 7-1 Big 12), while Paul Pierce added 15.

Brian Skinner had 13 points for Baylor (10-8, 5-3).

The Jayhawks went to a trapping defense halfway through the first half and forced Baylor into turnovers on eight consecutive possessions during a 21-2 run.

Kansas extended its school record with its 57th consecutive home victory.

Georgia 70, No. 12 Mississippi 68

ATHENS, Ga. — Reserve Larry Brown, a tight end on the football team, scored eight of his 14 points in the second half — including five straight in a late surge — to lead the Bulldogs.

Georgia (10-9, 2-5 Southeastern Conference) had lost its first five SEC games before beating Louisiana State on Saturday and then upending the Rebels (14-3, 5-2), who had won 10 of their last 11.

Georgia took the lead for good at 50-48 on a basket by G.G. Smith with 8:24 to go. The Rebels got within 54-53 before Brown scored five-straight points to give Georgia some breathing room again at 59-53.

Keith Carter led Mississippi with 21 points and Ansu Sesay had 19.

No. 13 South Carolina 74, Florida 72

COLUMBIA, S.C. — Freshman Antonio Grant scored a career-high 14 points, including a game-winning tip-in with 9 seconds to go, for the Gamecocks who won their 18th-straight league game at home.

South Carolina (15-3, 6-2 Southeastern Conference) trailed 55-43 in the second half, but tied the game three times in the final two minutes before Grant followed Melvin Watson's miss.

A 20-5 run to start the second half put Florida (10-7, 3-4) in command, but LeRon Williams, who transferred from Florida to South Carolina two years ago, scored 10 of his 14 points over the last 12 minutes.

Jason Williams scored 12 of his 18 points in the second half for the Gators.

No. 15 Arkansas 85, LSU 68

BATON ROUGE, La. — Pat Bradley was four-of-eight from three-point range and scored 26 points as the Razorbacks beat LSU for the 13th time in 14 games since joining the Southeastern Conference.

LSU trailed 64-58 with 7:39 left. Three minutes later they trailed by 18 points as Bradley hit five straight field goals, including two three-pointers, to put Arkansas (17-3, 6-1 SEC) up 76-58.

Maurice Carter had 29 points for LSU (9-9, 2-6), which had 20 turnovers and managed just four baskets over the final 11 1/2 minutes of the game.

Penn St. 67, No. 16. Iowa 65

STATE COLLEGE, Pa. — Joe Crispin had a career-high 23 points as Penn State handed the Hawkeyes their third-straight loss.

Dean Oliver had a chance to tie the game at the buzzer, but he dribbled until time ran out and couldn't get off a shot.

Jarrett Stephens had 20 points for Penn State (10-7, 3-4 Big Ten), which won its ninth-straight home game.

Ryan Bowen led Iowa (15-5, 4-3) with 17 points.

Stephens hit an unlikely three-pointer to put Penn State up 65-60 with 1:17 remaining. Bowen scored to make it a three-point game, but Pete Litsicky's two free throws put the lead back at 67-62.

No. 17 West Virginia 76, Pittsburgh 72

PITTSBURGH — Jarrod West's three-pointer with 2:46 to play put West Virginia ahead to stay and Adrian Pledger's two free throws with 14 seconds left finished off Pittsburgh.

West Virginia (18-3, 8-3 Big East) won its fourth in a row and seventh in eight games.

Pittsburgh (7-8, 2-6), coming off a 22-point loss at Big East tailender Rutgers, lost its third-straight and fourth in five games.

No. 22 Michigan St. 84, No. 25 Indiana 66

EAST LANSING, Mich. — Charlie Bell matched his career high with 17 points to lead five Spartans in double figures. Michigan State (14-4, 7-1 Big Ten) outscored the Hoosiers 48-30 and the Spartans capitalized on 22 Indiana turnovers to score 30 points.

KNOCKED DOWN, UP AGAIN

Huskers move to shut down Dies, Cats spank 'em 72-49

►CATS PULL AHEAD OF NEBRASKA DESPITE TURNS; MANNY DIES GETS 6TH DOUBLE-DOUBLE THIS SEASON.

SUN DEE MILLS

Manny Dies. Big 12 Player of the Week.

The Nebraska Cornhuskers didn't miss the headlines, but the Wildcats came prepared. Although the Huskers kept Dies well below his 21-point average, he achieved his sixth double-double of the season and the Cats came away with a decisive win, 72-49.

"We lost," Husker coach Danny Nee said. "Tonight, the better team executed and took care of the ball."

The Huskers keyed in on Dies quickly, and he committed a shooting foul on Husker center Venson Hamilton in the first seconds of the game. Hamilton sank one of his two free throws, giving an opponent the lead for the first time in a Big 12 home game in Bramlage Coliseum.

Cat point guard Duane Davis quickly kicked off a succession of three-pointers shot by everyone else on the court but Dies — guard Aaron Swartzendruber, guard Josh Reid and center Shawn Rhodes. This starting five is now 2-0.

"Lots of guys stepped up," Reid said. "They dropped down on Manny a lot, so the guys on the outside picked it up." Dies, one of four Cats to score in the double digits, had 11 points in the game. But Cat coach Tom Asbury was equally impressed with other aspects of Dies' game.

"We know Manny's not going to get 26 points every night," Asbury said. "Defenses are skewed toward him now. But 11 points, 10 rebounds, three assists, two blocks and a steal is a good game for him."

Defensively, the Cats kept Nebraska to 33-percent shooting for the game, 19 percent in the second half alone. But Asbury was hesitant to attribute the Huskers' poor shooting performance to his team.

"I don't think our defense was that good," Asbury said. "I just think they didn't play well in the second half."

The Cats put a rotating defense on Husker All-America candidate Tyrone Lue that kept him to seven points, his lowest point total of the season. He had only two rebounds and committed five turnovers as well.

Both teams were equal in the turnover department, a fact that didn't please Asbury.

"We just turned the ball over way too many times," Asbury said. "I thought we made some awfully strange things with the ball, and you have to give Nebraska credit for that, because they tend to do that with their defense."

Dies had a team-high four turnovers, most committed while he was pressured under the basket by trapping and double-teaming. Swartzendruber said Dies held up well under the pressure.

"Manny played with a lot of poise tonight," Swartzendruber said. "Some guys that have been shooting as well as him would try to put it up and force the shot, but he didn't do that. He had a really good floor game."

The Cats shot 45 percent from the floor for the game, and 50 percent from the three-point line. Rhodes was two-for-two outside the three-point line, and said his game benefited from the Huskers' plan of double-teaming Dies.

"I was getting some really good shots from the outside," Rhodes said. "Both times, I was just open from the middle. I just told them I was getting open."

Rhodes led the team with 16 points. Guard Ayome May had 12 points while Dies and Davis put in 10 each. Swartzendruber tied a career high with nine assists and set a career high with 10 rebounds. He said the tempo of the game deems these stats more meaningful than points.

"In a game like this, points aren't as important as the little things," Swartzendruber said. "Rebounds, steals and assists really help this type of game out."

Swartzendruber had only three points, one of the quintet that led off the game. Asbury said he was pleased with the outside shooting effort but didn't want to use it as a crutch.

"I don't want to have to go 50 percent from the three line," Asbury said. "It's nice. We'll take it, but it's not what you draw up."

K-State women lose in Iowa

AMES, Iowa — K-State's women's basketball team (9-8, 3-4) failed to push its Big 12 conference record above .500 for the first time this season, losing 64-46 at Iowa State Wednesday night.

Iowa State (17-3, 6-1 Big 12), which moved into the Top 25 on Monday, dominated the game after a slow start, out-rebounding the Wildcats 47-28 and keeping them to 30.5-percent shooting.

Angie Finkes led K-State with 14 points. Brit Jacobson, the Cats' leading scorer with a 13.8 average, managed only eight on four-for-14 shooting.

Cats keep Lue to season scoring low

JOEL WHITE
Kansas State Collegian

Amid thundering chants of "air ball" in Bramlage Coliseum, Nebraska's star point guard, Tyrone Lue, played his worst game of his season Wednesday night.

Lue scored seven points — 14 lower than his season average — and had five turnovers in K-State's 72-49 win.

"I thought he sucked tonight," Nebraska coach Danny Nee said. "But you know, he's not Superman."

Prior to Wednesday's game, Lue averaged 21.5 points per game and his lowest point total this season was 13, against Grambling State on Dec. 6.

Lue was kept to three-of-14 shooting from the field by the Cats, including two air balls, in 35 minutes of play.

In the first half, Lue made an open three-point shot from the corner and a fast-break layup, and turned the ball over to the Cats five times while playing all 20 minutes.

The second half brought more offensive woes for Lue.

His only points of the half came from a 15-foot jump shot with 10:55 left in the game.

A committee of Cat guards — including Duane Davis, Chris Griffin, Aaron Swartzendruber and Adam Lopez — had a hand in stopping Lue.

Davis, who guarded Lue until he picked up his fourth foul at the 17:42 mark in the second half, said Lue wasn't playing at his peak potential.

"He made some good moves," Davis said. "He just didn't make his shots."

When Lue was asked who was the most effective in guarding him, he said, "Myself."

K-State coach Tom Asbury said the defensive effort was concentrated on stopping Lue.

"We really skewed our defense toward trying to stop him. You've got to have a concerted effort to stop Lue," Asbury said. "That's not a gamble, that's a necessity."

Lue, who has a recurring abdominal strain, said he wasn't hampered by the injury.

"I might have been a little tight, but I wasn't hurt," Lue said.

The rest of the Nebraska squad played almost as poorly as Lue.

The Huskers shot 33 percent from the floor while the Cats shot 45 percent from the floor.

I THOUGHT HE SUCKED TONIGHT. BUT YOU KNOW, HE'S NOT SUPERMAN.

DANNY NEE
Nebraska head coach on All-America candidate Tyrone Lue

AFC doormat Broncos break out of underdog pigeonhole, make Packer fans feast on crow

I've been eating a lot of crow lately.

Sure, Super Bowl XXXII is over. Partiers have recovered from their hangovers. Mourners of the end of another football season are starting to tick off the days to baseball training camp.

But no one lets me forget one thing. I must have another helping of crow.

I was convinced there was no way the Denver Broncos had a chance against the Green Bay Packers in the Super Bowl. I was sure that for the 14th year in a row, the NFC would waltz away with yet another Super Bowl title.

There were to be no surprises. Led by superstar (and my No. 1 fantasy-football pick) quarterback Brett Favre, this year's Packers were to amaze, belittle and confuse Denver's defense. The Packer defense was supposed to attack, blitz and confine Mr. Heartbreaker himself, Bronco quarterback John Elway, and his undersized offensive line.

Elway's the man responsible for repeatedly twisting games involving the Kansas City Chiefs to suit his own evil means. Yeah, so he wants to beat the Chiefs. He does so, often singlehandedly. The fans are sick of seeing him do it.

But Elway's been practicing his ABC's.

He's had some time to do so, having seen his first of four Super Bowls 11 years ago at age 26. And on quarterbacks' bodies, football seasons are the equivalent of dog years. So he's really experienced, well, I don't do math, but it's a lot of years.

This year, the man most hated in Arrowhead Stadium had a mission from a higher power. He wanted that ring.

The elusive ring that Miami Dolphins veteran quarterback Dan Marino will probably never see.

Still, desire doesn't win ball games. Talent, defense and a running game like the one Denver showed up the Packer defense with — these things win ball games.

The Packers' defense got tired. Tired of seeing Denver running back Terrell Davis dashing between the gaping holes. Tired of seeing Elway engineer lengthy drives up the field. Tired of seeing defensive tackle Gilbert Brown pick himself up more slowly on every snap.

Favre tried. He tried to get the ball into the end zone in the waning minutes of the most exciting Super Bowl I've ever watched.

He tried to minister enthusiasm to an exhausted offensive line. Packer running back Dorsey Levens couldn't find the holes that Davis did. Rookie tackle Ross Verba committed two costly fumbles that shut down the Packers' chance of scoring.

And in the heat of the moment, when the game was tied at 24 and the Broncos were headed for the end zone, frustration set in. Frustration resembling the feeling of taking the ACT and having only three minutes left for 10 algebraic equations.

What happens when frustration sets in? People revert to human nature, no matter how big they are or how much money they make. They make mistakes. They get testy. They grab face masks, like Packer defensive tackle Darius Holland did.

The last thing Denver needed at that point was 15 yards. But Holland handed them over on a silver platter, making it that much easier for Elway to complete the game-winning drive. Davis just trotted into the end zone, totally uncontested.

If there had been two more minutes in the game, the Packers might have had a chance. But the Packers were tired. Elway was motivated. And the Broncos were steamed.

They were sick of hearing people like me tell them they were the underdogs. They were through saying how wonderful the Packers were. They didn't care that Favre idolized Elway as a boy. They just played their game.

And came out on top.

I'll admit it. I was shocked.

For a fan of the Chiefs, the only thing worse than the Broncos winning the Super Bowl would be the Oakland Raiders going undefeated on its path to a Super Bowl victory. For Chiefs fans, that would be undeniable torture. Ironic, isn't it, that the Raiders were the last AFC team to win a Super Bowl?

Amazingly enough, though, after personally hurling verbal abuse at Elway in Arrowhead countless times, my hard heart softened as he held the trophy over his head.

It must be a little like earning a college degree after many years of hard work with everyone telling you you'll never graduate.

Way to go, John. I'd like lemon pepper and garlic butter on my crow, please.

The Cryptiquip is a substitution cipher in which one letter stands for another. If you think that X equals O, it will equal O throughout the puzzle. Single letters, short words and words using an apostrophe give you clues to locating vowels. Solution is by trial and error.

Center offers art programs

CHARLE SIOUX CHARLETON
Kansas State Collegian

Local parents are learning that the Manhattan Center for the Arts offers more than gallery shows and theatrical performances.

Karen J. Lauseng, program director for arts center, said several hundred area kids attend after-school theater, clay and visual art classes at the center.

"Buses pick the kids up at school, and they can have transportation home after the class if they need it," Lauseng said.

Spring classes began Jan. 19, and most classes run six to eight weeks. The classes are partially funded by the YES! fund of the Robert R. McCormick Tribune Foundation, Lauseng said.

"When the students register for the classes, the parents indicate if they want a scholarship or need busing," Lauseng said.

Kassandra McKenna, a first grade student at Frank Bergman Elementary School, said she loved the creative drama class she started Monday.

At McKenna's first day of the class she was nervous when the teachers had the kids stand up and introduce themselves. By the end of the class she said she was more comfortable.

"We played this game where we had to do something, and the other team had to guess what we were doing," McKenna said.

For the first time the center is offering Barrier-Free Theater for special-needs teen-agers and adults, Lauseng said.

"We also work Linda Uthoff's theater classes from the high school, too. She brings a whole new excitement," she said.

The center will undertake the 10th anniversary Experimental Theater for high school students May 16-June 20.

Preschool Fairy Tale Theater is offered Monday mornings. Preschoolers can attend Story Telling in Clay classes, where they listen to a story, draw a picture and make a clay object inspired by the story.

"We try to serve all ages," Lauseng said. "In one class last year we had a young woman of 13 and an 83-year-old woman."

Jan Neal, center, checks the size of the piece of clay fourth-grader T.J. Beyer showed her during class at Manhattan Center for the Arts. Neal teaches the class, which is composed of third, fourth, and fifth graders from Ogdan Grade School.

JILL JARSULIC
Collegian

Adults can take classes in clay and the visual arts during the day. Mask-making and drawing techniques are just two workshops presented this spring.

There are 24 people teaching classes this spring, Lauseng said most are from Manhattan and the surrounding area. Artists from the community or people who have a lot of experience in a special area often come in and apply, she said.

Volunteers make a big difference, too, Lauseng said.

"We have so many volunteers. We could not run this organization without volunteers. They number in the hundreds it's incredible," she said. "We love them."

Tove Swanson, senior in public relations, has an internship at the center this spring. Swanson said she didn't want a corporate internship, and she said she felt she could learn a lot working for a non-profit organization.

"When I see the kids here it looks like they are really enjoying themselves. It is a good thing for both parents and kids," Swanson said.

Annual competition rewards creativity

DIANA LEE
Kansas State Collegian

Kansas writers now have the opportunity to turn raw talent into cash.

The ninth annual Kansas Voices writing competition gives writers the opportunity to submit unpublished works of poetry and prose.

"There are no guidelines for subject matter or presentation of entries. They will be judged solely on literary merit," said Ann Laws, Winfield Arts and Humanities Council administrative assistant.

Entries must be accompanied by an official entry form, which can be obtained through the Winfield Arts and Humanities Council, and a $3 entry fee for each submission.

The contest includes both youth and adult divisions in each of the two categories.

"We have hired judges that have published work. They will look at the entries and evaluate them on a strictly literary basis," Laws said.

The first-prize winners in adult poetry and adult prose will each receive $200. Each first-prize winner in the youth categories will be awarded $50. Honorable mentions will also receive prize money.

Essie Sappenfied, a writer who moved to Kansas in 1988, conceived the idea for the contest. The first one was in 1990, through the assistance of the Winfield Arts and Humanities Council, the Kansas Arts Commission and volunteers.

"The woman who started the contest wanted to begin some sort of writing contest for Kansas writers. It has evolved into what it is today for Kansas writers, including both youth and adult divisions," Laws said.

Reading to showcase local artists, poets

JOHN FRANSON
Kansas State Collegian

Beatnik poetry will be the theme for the first poetry reading of the semester tonight sponsored by Java Espresso & Bakery and the Union Program Council Arts Committee.

Jennifer Griggs, UPC Arts Committee adviser, said attendees aren't limited to reading only beatnik poetry.

"People who come can read whatever they want," Griggs said. "There's no pressure to get up and read. Of course, if we don't have anyone to read then there's not much to listen to."

Last semester UPC began giving the readings themes, starting with a Dr. Seuss theme. Griggs said giving the readings a theme has increased attendance.

"People know more what to expect if there's a theme," she said. "I think if it's a theme that interests people, then it's more exciting."

This year is also the first year the readings have been at Java. Griggs said this has boosted attendance as well.

"Last year we had them in the gallery. We also had them in Union Station. The poetry readings were really great for those that attended, but it seemed like we had a hard time being consistent with where we were going to have them," she said.

Griggs said she thought Java's atmosphere was also a draw.

"We thought the whole atmosphere of a coffee-house would add to the enjoyment," she said. "People would also easily be able to have refreshments. I think it's relaxing, and I'm always impressed with the quality of work when people read their own poetry."

New readings have already been planned for each month this semester. Future themes will include love poems, international poetry and inspirational poetry, Griggs said.

"It's an inviting atmosphere for people who are maybe a little self-conscious or just aren't sure about their own work," Griggs said. "Usually the reactions are positive."

Proposal would extend terms but limit their number

► HOUSE AMENDMENT OUT TO REBUILD TRUST.

STAFF AND WIRE REPORTS

TOPEKA — Kansas lawmakers could serve a limited number of years, but their elective terms would be extended under a proposed constitutional amendment considered today by a House committee.

"It would help win back some of the trust people have lost in our state government," sponsoring Rep. Shari Weber, R-Herington, told the House Governmental Organization and Elections subcommittee.

The subcommittee took no action on the bill.

A vote could come next week to send the proposal to the full committee for action, said subcommittee chairwoman, Rep. Deena Horst, R-Salina.

If approved by two-thirds of the Legislature, the question would go on the November ballot. If approved by a majority of Kansas voters, the measure would become part of the Kansas Constitution.

Under the proposal, legislators — who now serve as long as they can be elected — would be limited to 12 years in the House and 12 years in the Senate for a lifetime maximum of 24 years in the Legislature, starting in 2001.

The proposal would extend House terms from two years to four years and Senate terms from four years to six years. It would also increase the number of senators from 40 to 41 to avoid the possibility of tie votes in that chamber.

Under the plan, half of the House and one-third of the Senate would be on the ballot for each election after 2001.

Rep. Jeff Peterson, R-Manhattan, is the co-sponsor of the bill, and said he believes term limits and extended terms for representatives would be beneficial for Kansans.

"With the extended terms proposed in this bill, we can work on policy without having to continuously worry about running for office," Peterson said.

Peterson said the public is generally in favor of term limits, because of the fact that with new representatives come new ideas.

"By and large, the public favors limits because it would make government processes run better," Peterson said.

Peterson also explained that limits would prohibit people from making a career out of being a representative.

"There are representatives in the House right now that have been serving for more years than I have been alive," Peterson said. "This proposal will allow for a better turnover in the Legislature, which will lead to better representation for the public."

The term-limit issue has been before the Legislature in past sessions but never passed. There are 18 states with legislative term limits.

Fine Arts Council receives fee increase from Senate

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
Kansas State Collegian

After allegations that at least $6,000 of Fine Arts Council funds were misused during fiscal year 1997, Student Senate approved a 4-percent increase in the council's student privilege fee at their Thursday meeting.

Senate's approval means a $11,822 hike in campus privilege fees.

Senators voted 39-12 to increase funding for student organizations to $12,000 and to all other departments funded by the fee by 2 percent more than their current funding levels.

The measure needed 38 votes to pass. Agriculture Senator Bret Glendening, arguing against a fee increase, said he couldn't justify higher fees when his research indicated improprieties in FAC accounting.

"I looked at one book — one account in one fiscal year — and I found almost $6,000 in questionable funds that went to one computer in one office. That raised a flag to me," he said. "How many students use that? I have my doubts that any of them used that, but they paid for it. God, they paid for it."

Funds from the fine arts fee must go toward events or projects that benefit all K-State students. Glendening alleged those funds did not.

When questioned later, Glendening wouldn't name the department that he said committed the

Couple charged in abduction of baby

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — A couple who allegedly stole a newborn from her sleeping mother in a maternity ward were arrested late Thursday as they walked into a house 250 miles away.

The baby appeared to be in good condition, an FBI agent said.

Nearly 24 hours after the baby was taken from the University of Kansas Medical Center, the two suspects were arrested at the home of a family member in the city of High Ridge, near St. Louis, said David Tubbs, in charge of the Kansas City's FBI office.

The suspects were identified as Buddy Hall, 30, and Amanda Tull, 18, both from northwest Missouri. They were being kept on kidnapping charges.

Tubbs said FBI agents — two of them emergency medical technicians — had been waiting at the home for three or four hours and arrested the pair as they walked in.

Amanda Tull allegedly went into the room of Trish Nicole Shockey, 19, and told her about a drawing for free baby clothes. After a brief conversation, the mother — who had been sedated earlier — fell asleep, and Amanda Tull allegedly abducted her hours-old newborn, identified only as Carlie.

Hall allegedly told other visitors he was hanging around the maternity ward because his wife had had triplets, the FBI said.

Around 11 p.m. Wednesday, a camera recorded the couple leaving the hospital with a baby in an infant carrier.

"It seemed to be a planned operation, obviously, but we don't know if they were specifically going for this baby or any baby they could reasonably get out of the hospital," FBI spokesman Jeff Lanza said before the arrests.

Hours before the abduction, a security camera caught the suspects hanging around at North Kansas City (Mo.) Hospital.

Food-safety training becomes city priority

SHELLY SLATIER
Kansas State Collegian

Improving food safety in Manhattan means more training for some K-State employees.

A new city ordinance states all food service establishments must have a food-safety coordinator by April 1. In order to comply with the ordinance, many K-State Student Union cooks and managers, along with fraternity and sorority cooks, must take the SERVESAFE course.

Joe Kitterman, food service inspector for Riley County Health Department and course teacher, said the SERVESAFE course is the most widely recognized food-safety course in America and is from the Education Foundation of the National Restaurant Association.

"The selling point of this course is its recognition in more than 95 percent of all jurisdictions," Kitterman said.

Kitterman said three main goals of the SERVESAFE course are outlined in the textbook, Serving Safe Food. They are to help businesses keep their employees and customers, protect people and prevent food-safety errors.

"If people that come to the class apply what they've learned, it will make food safer," Kitterman said.

Everyone is encouraged to attend the class, and Kitterman said several places are sending more than one person. Paul Stolle, director of Union Food Services, said 15 people will be attending the class Saturday in the south part of Union Stateroom.

"Everyone is already certified in four hours of food safety required by Chartwell's," Stolle said, referring to the parent company of Food Services. "But we are sending at least one person in each department to the class."

Stolle said the Union and residence halls have food-safety training and are not required by the city ordinance to take the course. However, he said, an eight-hour class and a one-hour test will allow the company to have certified managers and give Kitterman a chance to work on teaching the course.

"To show good faith with the city and competitors, Chartwell's insists managers be certified in SERVESAFE," Stolle said.

There are eight class times available, and Kitterman said everyone who needs to attend has received a registration letter.

"If you don't serve potentially hazardous food, you don't have to go to the course," Kitterman said.

Judy Billings, head cook of Kappa Sigma fraternity for three years, said the course would be beneficial.

"It is one thing to go and learn about food safety, but I don't see why we have to take a test," Billings said. "No one likes to take tests."

She said she thought the course was designed more for restaurants than fraternity and sorority houses because restaurants have different safety rules.

Kitterman said a recent state inspection survey found all six fraternity houses inspected at inadequate sanitation levels, but the one sorority house inspected was rated adequate.

Some basic rules for the houses include hand-washing, washing dishes properly, keeping pests out, keeping food at the right temperature and storing chemicals properly. Kitterman said part of the reason the fraternity houses didn't pass inspection is that they do their own cleaning.

The cost for the course is $60 per person. The money goes to pay for the textbook, course, test and certification.

K-State already teaching newly mandated program

KELLEE MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

K-State has been partners with the Kansas Department of Agriculture and the Kansas Department of Commerce and Housing since fall 1996 to assist Kansas meat-processing industries with the implementation of HACCP.

HACCP, which stands for Hazard Analysis and Critical Control Points, was mandated by the federal government on Monday in large meat-processing plants. HACCP is a systematic, science-based process control for food safety used in food-processing factories to determine what points to monitor where food hazards might evolve.

Elizabeth Boyle, associate professor and K-State extension specialist of meat science, said HACCP is not a new process. It evolved in 1959 when NASA approached Pillsbury on ways to assure the safety of food in the space program.

"HACCP is not quality assurance," she said. "It deals with the safety of food."

Boyle, along with James Marsden, distinguished professor of meat science, and Fadi Aramouni, associate professor and extension specialist of meat science, teach the HACCP course in the animal science department. The course began in 1995 during the winter intersession. Spring 1997 was the first time it was taught as a semester course.

"We have had a lot of students who have graduated that took the course and now work in industries as HACCP coordinators," Boyle said.

In July 1995, the U.S. Department of Agriculture Food Safety and Inspection Service passed the Pathogen-Reduction Rule. This rule had four components: E. coli Process Control Testing, salmonella pathogen-reduction performance standards, sanitation standard operational procedures and the HACCP program. These four components were to be implemented at different times in the plants.

Memorial service planned Saturday to honor Wildcat alumnus killed in automobile accident

A memorial service for Nick Steichen has been scheduled for 2 p.m. Saturday at St. Isidore's University Chapel. Steichen, 23, was killed when the car he was driving ran off the road on his way home from Arizona he attended the Fiesta Bowl.

The service will be led by Father Keith Webber, who said the program includes Bible readings, prayers and an exchange of memories.

Steichen graduated summa cum laude in kinesiology at K-State and was the 1997 president of Kinesiology Student Association. He had begun doctoral studies at Creighton University.

The service is being organized by Kaye Ness, who was Steichen's friend and vice president of KSA with him.

Scholarship applicants given slight reprieve, have until Monday to turn in necessary papers

The deadline for scholarship applications for the 1998-99 school year is Feb. 1. Because Feb. 1 is a Sunday, the Office of Student Financial Aid will accept applications on or postmarked by Feb. 2.

The application is for new, continuing or transfer students. The application covers all university, college and departmental scholarships, except for the school of journalism and mass communications.

If you have renewable scholarships, you must reapply to receive them.

There are three ways to turn in an application. "The best way for continuing K-State students to apply is over the Internet. You can do it quickly, and you don't have to stop by to pick up the form or to turn it in," said Larry Moeder, the director of Student Financial Aid.

The other two ways to turn in the application are mail or turning it into the Office of Student Financial Aid, in 104 Fairchild Hall.

UFM to stage women's self-defense workshop, claims course can yield increase in confidence

UFM will offer a self-defense workshop for women of all ages from 6:30 to 10 p.m. Monday at First Lutheran Church. According to a description of the course from the UFM course catalog, the course was designed to teach women how to defend themselves against violent physical assault and rape.

The catalog goes on to say that women gain more confidence in social and professional environments by learning self-protection.

"Women need to be empowered. They should be able to go where they want to when they want to," Linda Teener, executive director of UFM, said.

Andi Parr, activities coordinator of UFM, said all material is taught in a practical approach that requires little physical strength.

She added that all methods are quick, effective and easy to learn.

"It is not an ongoing martial arts program," Teener said. "It's for anyone of any age who wants to learn how to take care of themselves."

Teener said she believes these classes benefit women by empowering them.

"Today many women are afraid to go out after dark," she said. "I think it is sad that we have to feel afraid."

The class is part of the national SHARP program, Sexual Harassment and Rape Prevention, which teaches women quick and effective ways to defend themselves.

Festivities for Republicans' Kansas Day include reception to honor Dole on Saturday afternoon

TOPEKA — The return of Bob Dole to mingle with those who supported him for decades and the excitement of election year politics will spice up Kansas Day activities for state Republicans this weekend.

Dole, who represented the state in the U.S. Senate for 27 1/2 years before resigning in June 1996 to run for the presidency, is having a reception from 12:30 to 2 p.m. Saturday at the Downtown Ramada Inn, headquarters for the GOP's annual Kansas Day observance.

Kansas was admitted to the Union 137 years ago Thursday — on Jan. 29, 1861. The anniversary of that event is celebrated each year during the weekend that falls nearest to the date.

The Republican Party, dominant since statehood in Kansas politics, long ago appropriated the celebration as its own. Kansas Democrats have a similar observance, celebrating Washington Days in late February.

The return of Dole — who will be accompanied by his wife, Elizabeth, president of the American Red Cross — highlights festivities that include the Native Sons and Daughters of Kansas dinner honoring Kansas basketball Coach Roy Williams and national public television's Elizabeth Farnsworth on Friday night.

Bomb blast at abortion clinic causes 1st fatality 1 week after 25th anniversary of Roe vs. Wade

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. — A powerful bomb exploded at an abortion clinic Thursday morning, killing an off-duty police officer who had just arrived for his moonlighting shift as a security guard and critically injuring a nurse.

It was the nation's first fatal bombing at an abortion clinic. The blast, which blew a crater in the ground and shattered windows and shook walls a block away, came just a week after the 25th anniversary of the Supreme Court's decision in Roe vs. Wade legalizing abortion.

"It felt like lightning had hit the building," said Lindsey Thompson, who was at a University of Alabama at Birmingham dormitory when she heard the blast.

Nearby dorms and a day-care center were evacuated for fear of a second, delayed bomb blast. Police Chief Mike Coppage said late Thursday afternoon no other explosive was found.

He said no one had claimed responsibility by Thursday evening.

Jim Cavanaugh of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms said the bomb appeared to be homemade and not intended to blow up the entire clinic. "It was a smaller device intended to kill or injure," he said.

A year ago, two bombs went off an hour apart at a clinic in Atlanta, injuring seven in the second blast. That bombing is still unsolved. Hours after the explosion in Birmingham, the surrounding area remained sealed off while bomb experts in masks and heavy protective gear combed over it.

The bomb went off about 7:30 a.m. just outside the main entrance of the New Woman All Women Health Care clinic, rocking nearby buildings at the university and leaving a crater outside the blackened, wrecked entryway. The explosion occurred as clinic employees were arriving but about 30 minutes before doors normally open to patients.

"We were shaking. We were 30 seconds away from being in that parking lot," said Terry Hermes, who was taking his wife, Lisa, to her counseling job at the clinic.

His wife, who has worked at several clinics, added, "I hope I can retain the belief that what I'm doing is right and not be scared off. After this, I don't know."

Muslims celebrate end of Ramadan

JOSHUA STURGILL
Kansas State Collegian

With the sighting of the new moon Wednesday night, Muslims in Manhattan and around the world celebrated the end of their holy month.

Muslims from Manhattan and western Kansas gathered Thursday morning at sunrise for Eid-ul-Fitr, the official end of Ramadan, the Islamic holy month that represents the fourth pillar of the Islamic faith.

The Sawm, or fasting that takes place during the daylight hours of the month, is an important time of reflection and contemplation of Muslim faith.

"During this time, we praise Allah for what he has provided," Majed Khan, graduate student in electrical engineering, said.

Though the moon couldn't be seen here in Manhattan, it was seen in other locations around the nation. If the moon wasn't visible, the celebration would have been postponed until today, he said.

The morning began with sunrise prayer on the crowded main floor of the center, while children played games in the lobby.

"There are twice as many people here as usual, because this is a time when many Muslims gather together," Khan said.

He added Eid-ul-Fitr is an especially important time for families.

"We give gifts and wear new clothes, because we are happy to fulfill the requirements of the month. All families are united on this day," Ashraf El-Houbi, graduate student in economics, said.

Gift giving is especially important to the children because they don't celebrate Christmas, Khan said.

After the sunrise prayer, there was a speech delivered by Abdullah B'ayazeed. He encouraged the attendees to carry the spirit of Ramadan with them throughout the year.

"Ramadan is a training course," he said. "It develops physical discipline, time management and self-control."

He said these should all be characteristics of a devout Muslim's life.

The speaker also urged Muslims to know their religion well enough to invite others to the Islamic faith.

"Anyone who comes with different rules than those revealed in the Book of Allah will not be accepted by Allah," he said. "You must be patient in inviting people and be willing to take the pain you might receive."

The feast of Eid officially began as the speech ended, and the participants moved to the dining hall for candies and desserts from around the world. One of the desserts, kahl, is made especially for Eid.

After the meal, photographs were taken with friends and family, and participants admired the clothing worn by different nationalities especially for the feast.

"Many people will go to the homes of family members after the meal," Khan said. "But because Eid is in the middle of the week this year, students have class, and many have to go to work."

Students broaden horizons in Peace Corps

LORY STONE
Kansas State Collegian

Peace Corps volunteers, including K-State graduates and faculty, said the experiences they gained in the Corps were meaningful and insightful.

Since its inception in 1961 by President Kennedy, the Peace Corps has had more than 150,000 Americans in 132 different countries volunteer. Thirty K-State graduates are now volunteering.

Robert Hudgens, assistant dean of the International Agriculture Program, volunteered in Bolivia from 1967 to 1970.

"I wanted to expand my horizons and learn experiences first hand," Hudgens said. "I had been in classrooms all my life."

Hudgens worked in agriculture extension and instructed people how to shear sheep, taught them about the proper diet for sheep and worked to control parasites.

He said his involvement was an important event in his life.

"It was probably the best thing I did up to that point in my life," he said. "It was a tremendously maturing experience."

Hudgens said that upon his return, he recognized a change within himself.

"I got back together with some college friends and found that we had different values," he said. "I had a lot more direction in what I wanted to do."

He found himself appreciating basic things such as good roads, telephones and American food. With a new perspective, he said he was shocked to see everything Americans take for granted.

Hudgens said he would like to see more K-State students become interested, because of what the Peace Corps did for him.

"It instills a sense of adventure, a seriousness about ourselves and a responsibility. I would like to recruit more students," Hudgens said.

Nationally, the number of Peace Corps recruits is increasing. Jeff Martin, public affairs specialist for the Peace Corps, said 1996 was a peak year with about 7,000 volunteers.

"The 1990s is an idealistic bunch. It is comparable to the 1960s," Martin said.

He said the 1980s was the "me" decade, a time when volunteering declined, and the 1990s generation is full of hope and optimism.

"The Peace Corps is popular again," he said.

He said there are now 6,500 volunteers in 85 countries, serving in areas varying from education to business. Most are in their late 20s, and 97 percent have at least an undergraduate degree.

Brad Roberts falls into this Corps demographic. Roberts graduated from K-State in spring 1988 with a geophysics major. After graduation, he decided to apply for the Peace Corps.

"There are minimal requirements, such as an educational background," Roberts said. He credited his involvement in the Future Farmers of America while in high school for helping him in the application process.

Hudgens said when he applied in the late 1960s, the application process was similar to the current process. Agriculture, community development and medicine were some of the areas that needed volunteers.

Roberts volunteered in Costa Rica, working in a rural area near the Pacific Coast. He was involved with farm management and helped small farmers to learn record-keeping practices.

Roberts said he decided to join because he would get to see a different country and the lifestyles there.

Roberts also said he was moved by the experience.

"It definitely changed my perspective on American society and the world cultural setting," Roberts said.

Hudgens said he often explains the experience to prospective volunteers by comparing it to a journey up a mountain.

"It is like climbing a mountain and watching everyone else scurry around down below," he said. "When you come back down, you have a whole new perspective."

Readers' rep improves dialogue with students

During our daily editors' meeting Wednesday, we received a log report of reader comments from Chris Dean, the Collegian readers' representative.

Readers contacted him through e-mail and phone calls. We heard concerns about story content, feedback on columns and questions about our production schedule.

Thank you for using our readers' representative. We took all your concerns and questions to heart. We'll continue to integrate your ideas whenever possible and make improvements to serve readers more effectively.

The readers' representative keeps us in check, and your comments serve as a daily survey of how well we're meeting the needs of the student body. To do our job better, we need to hear from more of you.

We think this is working, but we still need more feedback.

This campus is wildly diverse, but we want to represent all students to the best of our ability. Happily, many of the comments we received this week were informational.

It's our goal to cover what you care about, so tell us when we're meeting your need for campus, Manhattan, national and multicultural issues. When we're not, tell us what we can do to improve.

If your organization is not well-represented in the Collegian, call or e-mail us with information about upcoming events. Tell us which issues you care about.

Next week, the readers' representative will begin attending organizational meetings around campus. Contact him at readers@pub.ksu.edu if you'd like him to speak with members of your organization.

At each meeting, he will distribute a Collegian survey to find out which parts of the Collegian you're reading, which you're not and why.

He will give you an overview of the Collegian and offer information about the operations and policies of the news staff. He will also use the surveys as a springboard to deal with specific issues and answer your questions.

We appreciate your comments and look forward to an increased level of communication.

Clinton presidency represents ideals of youth even in face of scandal

President Clinton's bid for the presidency came somewhere between eighth and ninth grades for me — such an awkward, awkward time. I jumped on that Democrat bandwagon after something in Clinton's acceptance speech at the Democratic Convention got me riled up.

So, in my little journal, amidst the agony of unrequited loves, lie the beginnings of my admiration for the man who would someday be president. And, before you read any further, let me remind you that I was a painfully, embarrassingly awkward child. And melodramatic. And I thought I was so much smarter than I really was. And I was barely 14.

Sept. 19, 1992: Bill Clinton is well on his way to the presidency. I'll go crazy if (George) Bush wins. I'm going to start helping with the Democratic campaign on Monday.

Nov. 3, 1992: CLINTON WINS!!!! 286 electoral votes! (Ross) Perot — none. Bush — oh, a few. Yippee!!!

Jan. 20, 1993: Inauguration Day! Finally a decent president will take over. I honestly believe Bill Clinton will be a president whose name will be synonymous with Franklin Roosevelt, Dwight Eisenhower and John Kennedy.

The last entry seems a little cryptic these days — Clinton's name has indeed become synonymous with at least two of those former presidents. Unfortunately, the thing they have in common is allegations of participating in some sort of presidential grab-ass.

Back in 1992, I kept all sorts of newspapers and magazines about Clinton. I had my picture and a quote in a voting supplement for kids put out by The Wichita Eagle. I was even all about Fleetwood Mac after that 1992 campaign.

Here it is, five years later, and this hero of my childhood has a lot of explaining to do.

During all the hints and allegations of Clinton's sexual forays with various leopard-print loving women, my support for him has never wavered. None of it could be true, I told myself. After all, this guy was the president. No one is that dumb.

So, I ignored all the scandalous tidbits cropping up during the Clinton administration. I ignored them until Monica Lewinsky — and an unapologetically suspicious press — showed up. Now even the staunchest supporters of Clinton are finding themselves questioning his character. With words like impeachment and resignation floating around, it becomes even more difficult to know what to think.

Clinton came into the American forefront at a time when I was beginning to understand the whole nature of government. At that time, he stuck out from the masses of politicians as a genuinely nice guy. He was my first definition of politics, of the presidency. In 1996, the first year I could vote, he was the man I chose to run this country.

If I were younger, it would be like watching Spiderman crumble right before my eyes.

Of course I want to think Lewinsky is completely out of her mind, that she made up every bit of the alleged affair. Of course I want to side with Hillary Clinton when she says the whole incident is a right-wing conspiracy. Instead, I have a feeling the country is heading into trouble. Even while I'm equipped with this gut feeling — as I'm sure many others are — I cannot allow myself to think any impropriety on Clinton's part has taken place.

This is not to sing the accolades of Clinton's infallibility — he is one of us and prone to mistakes. Even big dumb ones that unfortunately occur in front of the world.

My quote in The Wichita Eagle's kids' voting supplement was something like, "I think Bill Clinton would be a good president because he has a daughter, and I don't think he'd do anything to mess up anything for her."

I hope I was right.

QUEST for the right questions

I am writing to address an issue that plays a role in the lives of everyone and to remind us of a responsibility we have to ourselves.

As individuals, we seek not just external (social acceptability), but internal (self-approval) harmony in life, a goal never fully resolved by the ready-made solutions with which our culture is ever so anxious to provide us.

Friday night I wasn't seeking, but I found: Aikido. I had wandered into Ahearn 301 and wondered about Philosophy of Life 101. This martial art is a breathtakingly elegant form of defense. Its foundations lie with the spirit of its creator, Morihei Ueshiba.

In disagreement with the concept of violence, Aikido became his life philosophy and was his means to self-improvement; in essence, it was his resolution to the challenges of the human experience. Pivotal to Aikido is the act of not "clash(ing)" with an attacker, but of "blend(ing)" with the attack. Harmony.

When I am seeking it, I find wonderful things. I am reminded of the wealth of organizations that care for the plight of humankind. I am reminded of Ichus, International Coordination Council — the organization that looks out for international students — Amnesty International, fraternities, sororities and a variety of other organizations that have the goal of unity.

It feels good to "belong" — isn't that a synonym for rightness, correctness? I never watched Sesame Street, but I've been told that one of its fundamental lessons deals with this concept "One of these things, doesn't belong here..."

About a week ago, a little blue book with the catchy title "Eckankar — Ancient Wisdom for Today" found its way to my coffee table. One of the first pages reads, "Eckankar is a religion for the individual... It is designed to help individuals find their own way back through God through direct personal experiences." Reading a little further, the reader discovers this is just another generic solution with a new set of rules, not actual encouragement to discover one's own solutions.

While being a part of a group unifies us with other human beings, this harmony is an external one. This means agreeing upon certain principles, fighting for specific causes and cooperating, and since human beings are inherently interdependent on each other, such common interest groups are good things.

Yet, in moderation, The group philosophy of Western religions establishes selflessness as one of its main goals (giving up the self for a god), and so does communism (giving up self for the state). But as the 20th-century philosopher Ayn Rand points out, once we have given up ourselves, what do we have left to give?

The idea that individuality can be considerably detrimental to the functioning of the group as a whole is clear. The inherent nature of any institution is to discourage too much individual thought. That is expected. It is then the responsibility of the individual to determine at what point this discouragement becomes brainwashing.

It isn't easy. Shouldn't a university be the place where free thought takes place? I was talking to a student some time ago who was dumbfounded at the behavior of the individuals in his graduate-level class. The assignment had been a research paper, for which all students would choose their own topics. But when paper topics were due after ample time, he was the only student who had one developed.

We're accustomed to having our topics, as well as the answers, handed out to us. This tends to be the case at this and many institutions for higher learning in the United States. Learning about what other people think is right is useful, but being brainwashed is not.

As Stephen Covey, author of the 1989 No. 1 national bestseller, "The 7 Habits of Highly Effective People" notes, "I have come in contact with many individuals who have achieved an incredible degree of outward success, but have found themselves struggling with... a deep need for personal congruency and effectiveness."

The world in which we live dictates which issues should be important to us and tells us what we need. But I do not need a plastic bag for my goods every time I go to Wal-Mart, nor do I need a variety of other free products that someone worked hard at $5.15 an hour to produce. What I do need is to be encouraged to think instead of constantly being offered someone else's solution.

It's easy to forget to not only seek our own answers, but to ask, "What is the right question?" or better yet, "What is the real issue?" As individuals, we must ultimately determine that for ourselves.

Solitude gives time to listen, reflect

Take your time. There's no hurry. Just relax.

When was the last time you heard these words? Has it been a while since they were directed toward you? I know it has been for me. I've been taking inventory of my schedule lately. Blowing the dust off some of the records revealed messy and untidy priorities. After further examining my activities, I realized when duty dominated the motivational factor, performance in those tasks started experiencing some kinks.

So I decided to do what I hadn't done for a few weeks. I sat in silence. No hurry. No distracting sounds. Just stillness.

I don't mean watching television alone or listening to the radio in your room. I mean real solitude. It is when you separate yourself from all noise.

For me, it took leaving my house and sitting outside. Solitude. It is nearly unheard of here on campus. People are everywhere, and posters announcing upcoming events plaster windows and announcement boards. The moment you decide to do nothing, the phone will ring or the doorbell chimes. It's your best friend, so what do you do? You go hang out.

I find myself making meals, scheduling meetings, attending meetings, reading textbooks, taking notes — the list goes on. There is so much intake, yet so little sorting out of what it means. As I get older, my responsibilities run faster and with more endurance. Some days I pant just trying to keep up. It's then I get frustrated.

So I went outside and did some re-evaluating. I did some serious thinking and talking with God and discovered some amazing things about him and his perfect grace. It's then I got the message to just relax.

If you want to try this isolation thing and get away from it all, be forewarned. The moment you decide to follow through with skipping out on life for a while, something will come up — it always does. You have to decide to just leave it. Tag it with the same priority as you would if a close friend needed you, and follow through. You are worth it.

The benefits are indispensable. Solitude often helps me in making some tough decisions. Important goals and pending relationships have been thought through and quality choices were made as a result.

If you have a huge decision facing you, and you're not sure if you are up to the challenge, find solitude. Sort things out. You'll be glad you did. At worst, you could say you tried it and it didn't work.

Don't give up too soon. Expecting to go and just be still all of a sudden is a false premise. It isn't that simple unless you have made it a practice. After sitting in silence for a few minutes I usually start to look around and wonder just what it is I'm doing. I often find myself starting to get fidgety and restless. But with a little self-discipline, stillness begins to agree with me.

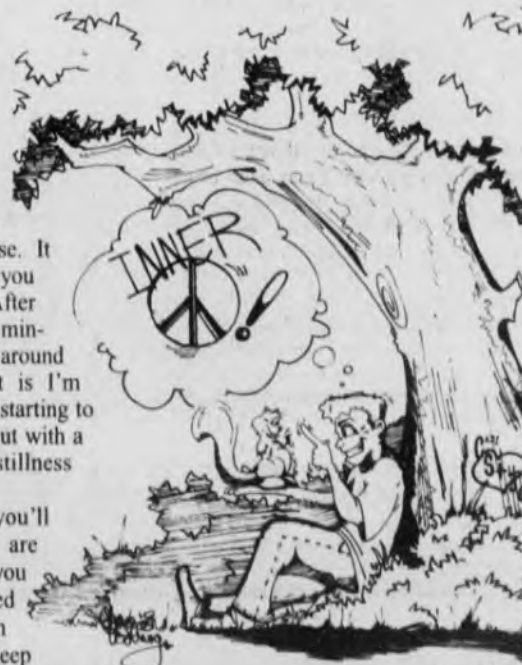

I'm not sure what you'll come across when you are alone, but I do know that you will become more focused and clear-minded. Soon you will begin to gain a deep respect for the beauty that silence and solitude offer. Whether you bring God into the picture, well that's up to you.

Today I'm not attacking any issues. I'm simply enjoying life. I suppose I am also playing the role of the doctor on the movie "What About Bob?" when he tells Bob to take a vacation from his problems. While I'm no doctor (and chances are high that you are no Bob), I do have a prescription for you: Take time out this weekend. Be alone, really alone. If you know God, listen. And if you don't, give solitude a try anyway. You never know what you'll discover.

You just might be able to return to the stampede of life with a little more assurance.

We could all use more of that.

Sports Round-up is your daily dose of the latest scores, stats and news from the world of sports outside of K-State. Compiled from Associated Press reports.

NCAA

Oklahoma State guard suspended indefinitely

STILLWATER, Okla. — Oklahoma State guard Estell Laster has been suspended indefinitely for violating team rules.

Coach Eddie Sutton announced the suspension Thursday without additional comment.

Laster, a redshirt freshman from Oklahoma City, has played in 14 games, averaging 3.1 points and 1.3 rebounds. He had not played in the past three games, due to tendinitis in his knees.

Oklahoma State (14-3, 4-3 Big 12) play Saturday at Texas.

NBA

Sprewell takes the stand to tell his side of the story

PORTLAND, Ore. — Latrell Sprewell took the witness stand Thursday to try to persuade an arbitrator to lessen the punishment he received for choking and threatening to kill his coach, P.J. Carlesimo.

The former all-star's testimony was expected to take up most of day three of the hearing. His agent, Arn Tellem, was among those in attendance.

Carlesimo wasn't there to hear Sprewell's side of the story. After listening to three of his Golden State players and two of his assistant coaches testify in an 11 1/2-hour session Wednesday, Carlesimo flew out of Portland on Wednesday night.

Carlesimo was with the Warriors for Thursday night's game in Seattle. The NBA has added a third day to next week's conclusion of the hearing in New York to allow Carlesimo to testify on Thursday.

Sprewell has attended all three days of the hearing. On Tuesday, the first day of the hearing, he entered through the main lobby of the office building where the hearing is, telling reporters he was anxious to get the hearing over with. Since then, he has entered and left the building through a back entrance, away from reporters and photographers.

NBA legend Abdul-Jabbar ordered to obtain anger management counseling after traffic altercation

LOS ANGELES — Retired basketball star Kareem Abdul-Jabbar, accused of attacking a man during a traffic dispute, was ordered Thursday to obtain anger-management counseling so that a court might consider a civil compromise of criminal charges, a city attorney's spokesman said.

West Los Angeles Municipal Court Commissioner Gary L. Bindman ordered the NBA's all-time leading scorer to obtain 36 hours of counseling and pay $5,000 to Jeopardy, a Los Angeles Police Department program for at-risk youth, said spokesman Mike Qualls.

Robert Shapiro, Abdul-Jabbar's attorney, did not immediately return a phone call for comment. Abdul-Jabbar was not required to attend the hearing and wasn't in court.

Abdul-Jabbar had been scheduled for arraignment on misdemeanor charges of battery and false imprisonment, but that was postponed.

Shapiro made the motion for civil compromise, a court-approved agreement between a defendant and a victim to settle a case. Deputy City Attorney Mitchell Fox objected, saying the count of false imprisonment constitutes potentially felonious conduct that could make the case ineligible for a civil compromise, Qualls said.

All-Star game causes ill feelings between Hardaway and Penny returns from knee injury

MIAMI — Miami Heat guard Tim Hardaway and Orlando Magic guard Penny Hardaway are not related. Now, there's some ill feeling between the two, at least as far as Tim Hardaway is concerned.

The Heat star is upset Penny Hardaway is returning from a knee injury just in time to start in the NBA All-Star game. Penny Hardaway, who has been out since Dec. 10, plans to return this weekend, play in three games and then start in the All-Star Game on Feb. 8 in New York.

The move probably cost Tim Hardaway a chance to start. Tim was chosen as a reserve, while Penny was voted to the starting team by fans despite playing in just 13 games.

"I think he wants to play in the All-Star game more than he wants to play for his team," Tim Hardaway said. "If it wasn't the All-Star game, I bet he wouldn't be playing for another week or two."

"I bet his team is mad at him. He's not going to be right, though. If he's coming back to try and play just for the All-Star Game, I don't think it's fair to his team."

Tim Hardaway said players should be required to play in at least 25 games to start in the All-Star game.

NFL

Packer president quiet on status of Holmgren

GREEN BAY, Wis. — Green Bay Packers president Bob Harlan won't say if he would grant any team permission to talk to Coach Mike Holmgren, who has two years remaining on his contract.

He did say that as of Thursday, the Seattle Seahawks had not asked to talk to Holmgren about the possibility of becoming that team's coach and general manager.

Harlan said the longer he went without hearing from Seahawks president Bob Whitsett, the more he believes there's not much to the rumors that Seattle is interested in Holmgren, who has made no secret of his desire to be a general manager in the NFL some day.

Harlan compared the situation to Dallas interviewing offensive coordinator Sherm Lewis for the Cowboys' vacant head coaching job.

"All I know is that Jerry Jones was very quick to jump when he wanted to talk to Sherm, he contacted (general manager) Ron Wolf and myself right after the ball game, immediately," Harlan said. "So, it's usually something that's done fairly rapidly."

At any rate, Harlan declined to say what he would do if the Seahawks come calling.

"Well, I don't think we'll say anything unless step 1 happens, and step 1 is asking for permission," he said. "It's speculation until somebody calls. And since nobody has called, as Ron Wolf said yesterday, there's really nothing to discuss."

Cowboys to interview Packer offensive coordinator for second time in search for new head coach

IRVING, Texas — Green Bay offensive coordinator Sherman Lewis says he feels like he has reached the semifinals in the search for a new Dallas Cowboys coach.

Lewis said Dallas owner Jerry Jones contacted him Wednesday, and he expected to be in Dallas Thursday for an interview for the Cowboys' vacant head coaching job. The pair also talked Monday in San Diego after the Super Bowl.

Lewis, 55, has spoken with the Arizona Cardinals and Atlanta Falcons in the last few years, but he did not classify those as legitimate job interviews compared with his discussions with Jones.

"I was hoping that I could get to the next stage," Lewis told the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel. "This is like getting to the semis."

Lewis is at least the third candidate Jones interviewed to replace Barry Switzer, who resigned Jan. 9.

Jones declined to say if there are additional candidates for the job. It is known the Cowboys owner met, in addition to Lewis, with former San Francisco 49ers coach George Seifert and former UCLA coach Terry Donahue.

Track team looks to capture trophy for 8th time

JOEL WHITE
Kansas State Collegian

In the eight-year history of the K-State-Kansas-Missouri Triangular track meet, its traveling trophy, which is given to the team with the men's and women's highest combined point total, has left K-State's campus only once.

K-State's track team will try to secure the trophy for another year at the meet Saturday in Columbia, Mo.

"You still have the natural rivalry between KU and Missouri and that natural rivalry between K-State and KU," K-State coach Cliff Rovelto said. "But we've won this all but once, and it's probably a source of annoyance for them."

Rovelto said the meet's format is unusual. "It is internationally scored, which means every school will score two people in every event," Rovelto said. "It was designed to keep meets interesting."

Although the intention was to keep the scores close, Rovelto said that has not occurred in recent years.

"The last couple of years we've won by relatively comfortable margins," Rovelto said.

If the national track rankings are any indication, the Wildcats should win by a comfortable margin in this week's triangular.

Before last Saturday's track meet at Iowa State, K-State's men's and women's teams had the highest power rating in the United States Track Coaches Association power-rating system.

Rovelto said the USTCA power rating is a measure of how a team would fare in a conference meet, but it is not totally accurate.

"Some teams haven't competed yet, some teams haven't competed with their best athletes and some teams haven't sent in their information," Rovelto said. "We shouldn't be ranked first in both."

In last week's Track Wire ranking, K-State's women were ranked 13th, while the men were ranked 22nd in the nation.

"The Track Wire is one individual's opinion on how he sees the NCAA meet playing out," Rovelto said.

Rovelto said a reason for the high rankings is the quality of depth on both teams.

"I think our real strength is that we don't have any glaring weaknesses," he said.

The performances of K-State's freshmen and sophomores have provided the needed depth, Rovelto said.

"Annie Wetterhus and Amanda Crouse have done a wonderful job for freshmen," Rovelto said. "Even if they weren't freshmen, they still would be doing a wonderful job."

Crouse, a middle-distance runner, placed second at the Iowa State University Open in the mile with a time of 4:57.69. She will compete in the 1,000-meter and the 3,200-meter relay at the K-State-KU-MU triangular.

Wetterhus placed second in the ISU Open's 5,000, finishing with a time of 17:19.7. She, along with Crouse, freshman multi-eventer Carmen Wright and junior middle-distance runner Karriema Parris will compete in the 3,200-meter relay.

Wetterhus, who was a NCAA National Championship qualifier in cross country, said it is too early to tell how well her track season will go.

"I think I've had a good season so far, but I still need to turn in some faster times," she said.

While being overshadowed by all-America Renetta Seiler in the weight throw, sophomore Anna Whitham has quietly had a great season so far, Rovelto said.

Whitham provisionally qualified for the NCAA Indoor Championships in the weight throw with a throw of 56 feet 3 inches at the ISU Open.

"Without those people, our team wouldn't be where we are," Rovelto said of the young contributors.

BUFFALO STANCE

Men's team hopes to keep postseason dream alive with elusive Big 12 road victory against Colorado

Women's team needs win against Colorado to return to even on season, sweep season series against Buffs

SUN DEE MILLS
Kansas State Collegian

As the Wildcats head for the Colorado hills this weekend, one thing is certain — the team needs to return with a win.

Coming off wins at home against two teams the Cats will see again within the next 10 days provides advantages and disadvantages, Coach Tom Asbury said.

"The advantage, of course, is in preparation," Asbury said after the 72-49 win over Nebraska on Wednesday. "Everything is so fresh, so it's bound to come back to us just like that."

On Saturday, the Cats face Colorado, a team they defeated Sunday 78-60. They will go to Lincoln, Neb., to face the Cornhuskers on Feb. 3.

Beating both teams in Bramlage Coliseum was good for the Cats' record, but Asbury said this could be viewed as a disadvantage as well.

"Now beating a team again," Asbury said, "well, they'll go back and say to themselves, 'Look at what they did to us.' We'll be fighting that."

Before the home wins, the Cats sat at 2-4 in Big 12 competition. With the wins, the Cats are sitting at .500 in the Big 12 for the first time since the new conference was formed.

"We're up to 4-4 now, and we're playing pretty good," junior center Shawn Rhodes said. "We've got four more chances on the road now, and we need one."

To get an invitation to the NCAA Tournament, the Cats are in direct competition with Nebraska and Oklahoma State, both of which have a 4-3 record.

Missouri, Colorado, Texas Tech and Iowa State are sitting with 3-4 records, so this is a crucial road stretch for the Cats.

Asbury said he knows what it will take for the Cats to get an invitation to either the NCAA or the NIT, but refused to disclose his opinions.

"It's hard to get a win on the road in the Big 12," Asbury said. "Kansas was beating Baylor (Wednesday) by about 40 points, and Texas Tech was beating Missouri at home tonight, too."

DAN MERKER
Kansas State Collegian

The point has been reached in the Big 12 basketball season where teams are starting to get quite familiar with one another.

When the K-State women's basketball team takes the court Saturday afternoon against the Colorado Buffaloes, it will be their second meeting in 11 days and their final encounter of the regular season.

The Wildcats have played just two games since their last matchup with the Buffs, a 64-52 K-State win in Manhattan. That win ended a stretch in which the Cats lost five of six games.

The Cats used the momentum from that win to beat Baylor on Saturday, but lost to Iowa State on Wednesday night in Ames, Iowa, 64-46. The 46-point output by the Cats was their lowest of the season.

"We just didn't play very soundly at all," K-State assistant coach Sue Serafini said. "On both the offensive and defensive ends of the court, we didn't play well at all."

The defeat to the Cyclones left the Cats 9-8 overall and 3-4 in Big 12 play, while the Buffs, fresh off a loss to Oklahoma on Wednesday, enter the game at 8-9, 2-5 in the Big 12.

In the first meeting of the season between the Buffs and Cats, K-State shot a scorching 71.4 percent from the field in the second half, a season high. Center Angie Finkes led the Cats in scoring with 16 points.

"Angie has taken a major stride," Serafini said. "Her game has really improved, and she's going to be a great player."

Even though K-State won the teams' first meeting this season and the Cats have a one-game edge in conference play, a Wildcat win is far from automatic.

Colorado has a 7-2 record at home this season, while the Cats have won just one of six road games, a 67-64 win over Ohio State on Dec. 13 in Columbus, Ohio.

Despite playing in hostile territory and in high elevation, Serafini said the most important part of winning on the road is not physical, but mental.

"I think the biggest factor is to step on the court with the same team as we do at Bramlage," Serafini said. "If we do that, we should be able to win."

Golfer's dream shouldn't be shattered because of PGA and Nike Tour's no-cart rule

I will admit to what few people will. I am one of those people who willingly watches golf on television. In fact, I have no problem admitting that, and I enjoy it greatly.

I love watching the finest golfers in the world practice their craft with grace and class, and I marvel at the talent they have. I just wish I were half as good as these fine players.

It takes considerable talent to play golf at an elite level, although it might not look like it. If you don't believe it, go to a driving range and try to hit that little white dimpled ball more than 200 yards, let alone the 330 yards Tiger Woods can often send the ball.

It's extremely difficult to put the ball remotely close to where you aim on a regular basis, so I have a great deal of respect for anyone who can play the great game of golf for a living. The nice thing about professional golfers is they don't get paid unless they perform.

For those who aren't familiar with the PGA Tour, it has a lesser tour — the Nike Tour — which is kind of like golf's minor leagues. Players who do well on the Nike Tour, formerly the Ben Hogan Tour, go on to earn their PGA Tour cards.

It takes some fine play to even earn a spot on the Nike Tour, play that most recreational golfers such as myself can't even dream about.

One of the players on the Nike Tour, Casey Martin, is suing the PGA Tour for use of a golf cart. While many might think of a cart as one of the motorized wonders of the 20th century that allows recreational players to play after too many visits from the beer girl, it also allows older and disabled players to play the great game of golf.

The PGA and Nike Tours don't allow players to use carts, but the PGA Senior Tour does. This rule makes sense, so these professional athletes, and they are professional athletes, don't have a competitive advantage. For most, it's not a problem. Walking five miles a day is nothing to most professional golfers, especially because they all have caddies to carry their heavy golf bags.

For Martin, though, walking five miles a day for four consecutive days is impossible. He was born with Klippel Trenaunay Weber Syndrome, a circulatory disorder in his right leg that is incurable and often prevents him from walking a round of golf.

Martin got a court injunction allowing him to temporarily use a cart until the case is heard Monday in Eugene, Ore. Martin is suing under the Americans with Disabilities Act to be able to permanently use a cart. During the injunction, he was able to win the Nike Lakeland Classic earlier this month.

The important thing here is Martin has proven he is qualified to play on the Nike Tour, and he's not doing this just to prove a point. He is simply trying to do his job — just like the rest of us. He should not be prevented from doing it because of a rule.

While the rule makes perfect sense for everyone else on tour, a cart is a necessary tool for Martin. He needs the cart like he needs his putter. He can't do his job without it.

Not allowing Martin to use a cart is like trying to force a person in a wheelchair to overcome a staircase. Judging from the construction around Cardwell and Kedzie halls, this is not a reasonable expectation.

His dream, job and livelihood should not be taken away because of a rule that was obviously made with the mindset that anyone who would actually need a cart wouldn't be good enough to play professionally.

But Martin has overcome all odds, and this red-tape obstacle is the last and easiest hurdle for Martin to clear on the way to his dream — playing on the PGA Tour.

I admire everything Martin has done and hope everything goes his way in the upcoming litigation.

I have become a Casey Martin fan and have a lot of respect for the man.

When I'm on the course, trying to improve and reach the same dream Martin has, I will remember how lucky I am to be able-bodied.

And much to Nike's dismay, I'm sure, four words will be on my mind, inspiring me.

I am Casey Martin.

Portable grills cook as couples' top gift

CHARLE SIOUX CHARLETON
Kansas State Collegian

Portable grills have surpassed toasters as the gift of choice for summer weddings, said Julie Platt, Waters True Value Hardware employee. The hardware store was one of 22 participating vendors at the 28th annual Manhattan Bridal Show that took place Jan. 25 at the Houston Street Ballroom.

Platt said people still buy kitchenware for newlyweds, including toasters, cookware and bakeware. Pizza stones are popular as well as breadmaking machines and coffee or iced tea pots. Some couples register for hand tools like electric drills or screwdrivers, she said.

"The most unusual wedding gift we ever sold was a ladder," Platt said. "We tied it up with lots of bows and off they went."

Jenny Herman, Concordia, Kan., wasn't thinking of toasters or screwdrivers. She said she was still working on the details of her Aug. 1 wedding and needed a few more ideas.

"I really enjoyed the fashion show," Herman said.

Wedding gowns, bridesmaid dresses and tuxedos were the main attractions of the fashion show, but the honeymoon lingerie drew oohs and aahs from the crowd.

Finding the right tuxedo was just one reason John Popp said he attended the show with his fiancée, Wendy Odle. Popp, junior in secondary education, math and physics, and Odle, senior in secondary education, math and chemistry, were engaged Jan. 8. Their wedding is June 13.

"We wanted to get an idea of what was available in Manhattan, especially as far as tuxes go," Popp said. "We've got a pretty good start, but we have a long ways to go."

Odle said she got many ideas about things such as candelabras and flowers. Odle said her mother lives in Prairie View, Kan., and is going crazy trying to make plans with her daughter so far away.

"We make lots of long-distance phone calls," Odle said. "I'm planning to make a lot of road trips, too."

Jena Pralle, senior in music education, set her wedding date for July 18 to avoid rushing in May. Pralle, who plans to student-teach next fall, said she looked at brides' gowns, attendants' dresses, cakes, flowers and decorations.

"I'm trying to make as many decisions as possible before midterms," she said.

Robert McElwain, Pralle's fiancé, proposed to her in San Francisco, on the beach at sunset.

"I'm very excited about the wedding, but I know we're not ready," McElwain, sophomore in business administration, said.

Linette Heintz, leasing manager for the Houston Street Ballroom, said an estimated 700 participants attended the show.

"Over 600 pieces of cake were handed out and all 650 programs," Heintz said.

"We weren't expecting this many. It was a good turnout."

K-STATERS KOUASSI AND TA'LISHA KOUAKOU WERE MARRIED ONCE IN KANSAS CITY, KAN., AND AGAIN IN THE IVORY COAST OF AFRICA, SHOWN HERE. KOUASSI SAID THE BIGGEST DIFFERENCE IN THE WEDDINGS WAS THAT THE ONE IN AFRICA WAS COMMUNICATED SPIRITUALLY.

International Week at K-State united two students, one from Kansas City, Kan., and one from the Ivory Coast in Africa.

Kouassi Kouakou, who graduated with a doctorate in grain science, and Ta'Lisha Byers, who graduated in family studies with a minor in education, were married twice, once in a ceremony in Kansas City, Kan., and again in an African ceremony last semester.

Kouassi, originally from the Ivory Coast, and Ta'Lisha, from Kansas City, met at K-State in Spring 1994 during K-State's International Week. From that point on, the two were best friends and became engaged in February 1996.

"She was one of the best things K-State gave me," Kouassi said.

Kouassi and Ta'Lisha were first married on April 12, 1997 in a religious ceremony in Kansas City, Kan., with more than 600 guests. The Kansas City wedding was a large traditional wedding with 13 bridesmaids and 13 groomsmen.

Betty Jo White, former professor of clothing and textiles, attended the Kansas City wedding. Kouassi had rented part of her house while at K-State.

"The bridesmaids wore beautiful, long, purple, floor-length gowns," White said. "I think the color was a symbol for K-State."

The wedding in Africa was a civil ceremony with more than 800 guests.

"The wedding in Africa lasted from 10 a.m. Saturday until 1 a.m. Sunday," Kouassi said. "The actual civil ceremony was 15-20 minutes long, and the rest of the day was spent at my family's home in our honor. My wife became queen and I was king for the day."

The wedding in African was planned for the couple by his family.

"I didn't have to do anything for the African wedding. I just showed up," Ta'Lisha said. "I didn't know what would happen next or what to expect."

Ta'Lisha said she wore three different outfits made for her by Kouassi's family during the wedding in Africa.

"The clothing was just fabulous. It's so hard to explain," she said. "My first outfit was yellow with streaks of gold and rose. It was hand-made by my sister-in-law."

Kouassi's mother, who died in 1984, also made clothing for his new wife to wear on her wedding day.

"I changed into Kinta clothes from the Ashanti Kingdom. This was clothing Kouassi's mother had made and wanted me to wear," Ta'Lisha said.

Ta'Lisha also wore gold jewelry, which had been Kouassi's mother's.

But the clothing Ta'Lisha wore at the wedding wasn't the only difference between the two ceremonies.

"One of the biggest differences in the weddings was that the one in Africa was communicated spiritually," Kouassi said. "We are linked to our ancestors, and they are our link to God. That's why we went to the Ivory Coast. We got married closer to my relatives, so we could get their blessings through God."

Hazel Byers, Ta'Lisha's mother, said she also noticed the differences between the weddings.

"One thing that was unique to me was that Kouassi wore a crown," Byers said. "It signified that they were king and queen for the day."

The trip to Africa for the wedding was the first time Ta'Lisha and her mother had set foot on African soil.

"I wanted to kiss the soil," Byers said. "It felt so wonderful to be there since that's where my roots are."

The African wedding had a disc jockey, a live band and a sit-down dinner. Among the guests were 14 village chiefs, which are Kings of tribes in Africa.

"The village chiefs are equivalent to senators here in the States," Kouassi said. "It was a great honor to have them attend our wedding."

Kouassi and Ta'Lisha now live in Bethlehem, Pa. He is the manager of quality assurance for ConAgra, and she is a counselor at St. Luke's Addiction and Treatment Center.

"I want to do more double-checking to be sure — not 90-percent sure, not 95-percent sure — but 100-percent sure that these funds were not spent in the spirit of the fine arts fee," he said.

FAC members never defended themselves against the allegations during the meeting.

During debate, senators questioned the amount of money that some departments had left unspent in past years, which created leftover — or reserve — funds.

They proposed amendments with smaller fee increases.

reserves, saying most departments could explain why they hadn't spend funds from fiscal year 1997.

Privilege Fee Committee Chair Aaron Otto agreed, saying other language within the bill would reallocate any reserves more than 10 percent of the total fee level, alleviating any problems.

Otto said the fee increase was overdue for FAC, which hadn't seen an increase since 1988.

"This bill is not Santa Claus coming home and giving everything away except the kitchen sink. This bill is pretty thrifty. We're getting a hell of a deal," he said.

Arts and Sciences Senator Mandy Reese echoed Otto's argument in her debate. An inflationary increase was necessary, she said.

"We're not asking for a 4-percent increase so that we can do great bigger and better things. We're asking for a 4-percent increase so that they can stop cutting what they're doing," she said.

"They're doing really great things, and they're doing them for the students. That's a part of education."

K-State familiar with new rules

This produced a large need to train students and companies with the principles of HACCP, Boyle said.

Boyle said there are many food-processing plants not mandated by the government that have begun to phase the HACCP program in because many businesses require the system for their incoming food products.

Large plants with 500 or more employees have been working on HACCP for five years. The smaller meat plants will be mandated by the government to implement HACCP over the next two years.

Boyle said consumers hear so much about HACCP that they believe it will solve all food-processing problems. However, it is just one tool to enhance the safety of the food.

"Less than 10 percent of the outbreaks are attributed to problems in the plant. The rest of the 90 percent occurs in food service or at home," Boyle said.

Movie oozes cheese, cameos, latest hits by too-hip girl group

► BRITISH GROUP'S FILM STANDS AS BLATANT SELF-PROMOTION.

PHIL KELLUM
Kansas State Collegian

"Spiceworld" is no "Citizen Kane." If you thought "Titanic" was the king of disaster movies, you haven't seen "Spiceworld" yet. It's been described as a cross between the Beatles' "A Hard Day's Night," "This Is Spinal Tap" and "Speed." I don't think so, maybe "Speed 2."

The movie seems like a campy promotional video to sell more Spice Girls albums and merchandise to 11-year-old girls.

It starts out with a vaguely James Bond-esque intro complete with Spice Girls silhouettes and their new single playing.

Then it cuts to them in their Union Jack-embellished double-decker bus. And, of course, there's a lot of cleavage and tight clothes galore on all five Spice Girls.

The entire film concentrates on the girls traveling throughout the British countryside with their managers and Meat Loaf, who plays their bus driver, Dennis.

Former James Bond Roger Moore is Chief, who runs the Spice Girls show. He is seen petting a pig, in a direct spoof on James Bond.

Moore also delivers bizarre lines such as, "The drummer who has no sticks has no backbeat," and "When the speeding melon hits the wall, it's Christmas for the crows."

Throughout the movie, a film crew making a documentary about the group follows the Spice Girls while they are rehearsing for a big concert at Royal Albert Hall.

BBC radio personality Jools Holland is the musical director, who, during a rehearsal, tells the Spice Girls, "That was absolutely perfect without being any good."

The backing band was too funky anyway, I thought.

Naoko Mori is the Spice Girls' best friend. She's pregnant, so of course, there's a dream sequence with all the girls pregnant. It's truly frightening.

Meanwhile, the editor of a London newspaper is hellbent on destroying the Spice Girls, so he hires a photographer to snap photos to bring them down. At a press conference, Scary Spice is asked if they like boys and replies, "Is the Pope Catholic?" The photographer then causes a scandal about the Spice Girls' doubting the Pope's Catholicism.

The girls see aliens in the woods when they have to go to the bathroom in the middle of nowhere. The aliens ask for tickets to their show at Royal Albert Hall. One grabs Scary Spice's breasts, and Posh Spice signs one's belly. Even more frightening.

George Wendt and Mark McKinney portray movie producers who pitch ideas to the Spice Girls' manager, one idea being a direct "Independence Day" ripoff called "Spice Force 5." Maybe that should have been the point of this movie instead.

While Mori is in the hospital having her baby, the Spice Girls are recruited by a family to bring its son out of a coma. Of course, he wakes right up when they offer to show him their breasts. Who wouldn't?

After Mori gives birth, one of the girls says, "Now that is girl power!" Girl power is, of course, the Spice Girls' version of feminism and their rallying cry.

All in all, go see this during the cheap matinee showings or when it hits the dollar theaters. The cameos by Elvis Costello (playing a barkeep), Bob Hoskins and Elton John are pretty cool. You also get a tour of all of London's prominent sights in the background of most of the shots.

Oh yeah, every single damned Spice Girls single is sung in its entirety throughout the film. It's decent if you like cheesy, campy movies or you're a Spice Girls fan.

Pink Floyd puts new spin on 'Oz'

► TOURING LASER SHOW ROLLS INTO BRAMLAGE FOR SHOW TONIGHT.

TODD PACEY
Kansas State Collegian

David Gilmour, meet Dorothy. The Dark Side of the Moon, meet the yellow brick road. Manhattan, meet the Dark Side of the Rainbow.

Paramount Event Services is bringing this new twist to its laser light show at 8 tonight at Bramlage Coliseum. The laser light show has been touring since the mid-1980s, but the addition of "The Wizard of Oz" is relatively new, said Marc Solis, director of marketing at Paramount.

"I think this is only the fourth or fifth show. We want to test market this idea, and we chose Manhattan because of its strong student community. We did a show there before, and we really liked Bramlage," Solis said.

Pink Floyd never said the Dark Side of the Moon was made as an alternative soundtrack to "The Wizard of Oz."

This project is more the discovery of coincidences by fans. Solis said some of the things are just too coincidental, and that it is eerie.

Some of these include Gilmour singing "look around" as Dorothy complies. Others are more based on drama, such as the munchkins dancing to the bass line in "Us and Them." The heartbeat at the end of the album also coincides with Dorothy beating on the chest of the Tin Man.

There are still plenty of general admission tickets remaining for the event, said Jim Muller, associate director at Bramlage.

"This show will offer people a different kind of entertainment. This is an interesting show. This is not like the headlines that we normally have, but rather this is a different type of entertainment," Muller said.

Solis expressed similar sentiments. "For people that have never seen a laser show, this is the one they have to see," he said. "Even for those that have seen a laser light show before, this show is much more than any ordinary laser light show. This is like a rock concert, where the lasers are the artists."

Union Station helping Christians band

SARA ZENGER
Kansas State Collegian

Live Christian music is coming to Union Station.

Station Cafe will sponsor local, regional and national Christian bands during the spring semester beginning tonight.

Last fall was the first semester for Station Cafe, a new format for Christian Dance Nights. Ryan Crowell, sophomore in mass communications and coordinator of Station Cafe, said the idea started as a one-time event for Christian campus groups to welcome new students.

"They canceled fee payment, so we didn't have a place to meet new people," Crowell said. "But it has evolved into something much bigger now from where we anticipated. We averaged about 250 to 300 people last semester."

Crowell said even though the purpose of Station Cafe is to be a Christian ministry, he said he thinks the events add to the live music scene in Manhattan.

"I've heard so many times there is no live music scene in Manhattan. I believe we're putting a dent in that. We're bringing in 16 quality acts this year," Crowell said.

Heidi McBride, program adviser for the Union Program Council, said

Station Cafe fills another niche.

"There's people that don't want to go out to the bars and drink a lot and want to come to a non-alcoholic venue to have fun. This provides that," McBride said.

Derek Shacklett and Beggar's Table is scheduled to perform tonight. Both artists play acoustic-based music.

Crowell said Beggar's Table has a loyal following in the Manhattan area.

"They played two shows last weekend in Kansas City and drew about 150 people from Manhattan who drove to see them," Crowell said.

Station Cafe opens its doors at 7:30 tonight. Admission is $2.

Exercising mind, body pays off in bedroom

CASSANDRA & JACK
Kansas State Collegian

Dear Cassandra:
I read abt penis enviee ... and it really got me more depressed than better, there in the article it wrote that you should accept the size of your penis but it also said that it would be ok if you were 5'4 with a 7 inch penis ??? ... ummm... i'm an adolescent male with a height of 5'10 and my penis is only 4 inches... is it really true that the males can do nothing to increase the size of their penis ? please help me abt this problem ... thanks kasandra ...

Dear Enviee,
The biggest muscle in the bedroom really needs to be the one between your ears, not the one between your legs. Women are generally attracted to smart guys because a good imagination goes a long way in bed. In your case, hit the books. Hard.

Thanks for writing,
Cassie

Dear Enviee,
Don't sweat it, kid. Forget Cassie, Big Jack's got your answers. Every woman will tell you it's all in the hips. Be creative. Go to the gym. Don't be afraid to do some hip-strengthening exercises because those are the muscles you are going to need in the bedroom. Most importantly, don't make the mistake of lying about your size, or lack thereof. As my good friend, 2Pac, once told me, "You ain't got to lie to kick it."

'We Are Your Sisters' salutes ex-slaves of 1800s

Now's your chance
"We Are Your Sisters" will be presented at 8 tonight at McCain Auditorium. To reserve tickets, call the McCain Box Office at 532-6428.

► PLAY USES DOCUMENTS TO PRESENT ITS POINT.

CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

To coincide with Martin Luther King Jr. Day and Black History and Women's History months, the Blue Heron Theatre production, "We Are Your Sisters," arrives at McCain Auditorium tonight.

Playwright Dorothy Sterling's "We Are Your Sisters" tells the story of African-American women who endured slavery during the early 1860s and then received their freedom. The play is based on actual narratives, diaries and other written historical accounts by African-American women during the Civil War era. Music and dance are included in this story of personal struggle.

Sterling, who is also the author of "Freedom Train: The Story of Harriet Tubman," penned "We Are Your Sisters: Women in the 19th Century" in 1984. The stage production began touring in 1992. The production began its off-Broadway tour in January 1997, following a successful April and May 1996 New York run.

Richard Martin, director of McCain

Auditorium, expressed his excitement about McCain's upcoming presentation of "We Are Your Sisters."

Martin called "Sisters" a legitimate dramatic production. A production he dubbed real theater and not like mainstream musicals. Those types of productions, Martin said, aim only to entertain and neglect to educate.

If anything, he said, "We Are Your Sisters" does both.

"One of the things we're trying to do is to provide a broad range of entertainment for the community," Martin said. "K-State students shouldn't be deprived of seeing legitimate theater.

"This topic is something we know very little about. Alex Haley had 'Roots,' but that was the situation of an African-American man. This play deals with a topic that's not very often dealt with in theater."

The Blue Heron Theatre company itself, Martin said, is also well-known both on and off Broadway.

"They do a great deal of work in schools in the New York area," he said. "And they do bill themselves as 'the thinking person's theater.'"

"THEY DO A GREAT DEAL OF WORK IN SCHOOLS IN THE NEW YORK AREA. AND THEY DO BILL THEMSELVES AS 'THE THINKING PERSON'S THEATER.'"

Focus group

The Collegian is forming a student focus group to discuss which issues will be important in this year's student elections. The results will help shape Collegian coverage for this year's elections. If you are interested in participating or would like to comment on issues that should affect the elections, contact Travis Lenkner at the Collegian at 532-6556 or e-mail lenkner at city@pub.ksu.edu by 5 p.m. Friday. The Collegian will conduct one focus group comprised of student volunteers and one focus group of student leaders to help determine what issues should shape this year's elections. Stories will be published about issues discussed during those meetings.

Election policies

The Collegian will not accept letters to the editor endorsing candidates. We will print letters that focus on issues in the campaign. Each presidential ticket will be contacted about the possibility of a guest column.

Filing period for elections starts today

ANGELA KISTNER
Kansas State Collegian

Starting today, K-State students have two weeks to file for this year's Student Governing Association elections. As the deadline for filing approaches, students have begun to voice their ideas and opinions about the issues they want candidates to focus on.

"I would say fees are always an issue," Sara Tirrell, freshman in pre-medicine, said. "Because we're all students, and we don't want to spend money."

Tirrell said periodicals in Hale Library seem to be an issue as well.

Other students said they agree the library should be on the minds of candidates as they run for office.

Katy Morton, junior in animal sciences and industry, said the library needs funding.

"I don't see anything wrong with having a privilege fee for library funding. I mean, it's the library," Morton said.

Emily Howard, sophomore in business, also said she wouldn't mind paying a privilege fee to fund the library.

What do we think?

The Collegian editorial board examines what the beginning of election time means for students, candidates.

Muriel Riedel, sophomore in education, said the library is an important issue, but his concern didn't focus on its funding.

"I don't know how to use the library very well. If they could come up with a library orientation course for students, it would save time and energy for employees," he said.

Riedel also said many of the buildings on campus need to be fixed.

"Some of the buildings on campus are in pretty bad shape. I was reading where Seaton had a leak in the attic," he said.

Another issue students are still concerned about is parking — the amount of tickets and spaces.

"What they charge you for a ticket is outrageous. Downtown they only charge you $2. On campus you could pay $58," David Smartt, freshman in criminology, said.

"There aren't enough parking spaces either," he said.

One student is concerned about the faculty hiring freeze.

"There are 400 students in my finance class. K-State needs to hire more quality faculty," Brian Howell, junior in management information systems, said.

Howell said if K-State hires more quality faculty, it can build strong colleges. However, if K-State keeps hiring graduate teaching assistants at minimum wage, it will lose them to other universities and the colleges will not be able to build strong programs.

Howell said he is also concerned about voter turnout.

"I want people to get out and vote. It's kind of stupid to spend so much money and time on elections when only 13 percent votes. It's a waste of our resources," he said.

Finally, two students shared what they were looking for in a candidate.

"I would vote for someone younger, and who hadn't previously been in student government because they would have fresher ideas," Riedel said. "We need new candidates in student government all the time."

Morton said she wanted candidates who would stick to what they originally said they were going to do.

'I HAVE KEPT THE FAITH'

REMEMBERING NICK STEICHEN

A friend of Nick Steichen's choked back tears as she read a Bible passage at a memorial service Saturday.

"I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race," said Deanna French, senior in nutrition and exercise science. "I have kept the faith."

Members of the congregation at St. Isidore's University Chapel hung their heads and dabbed at their eyes. Some were friends, some family of Steichen, who died in a car crash on the morning of Jan. 2.

Most of the afternoon service was spent in silence, in between grand piano strains of Bach's "Jesu, Joy of Man's Desiring," hymns and pronouncements by the Rev. Keith Weber of St. Isidore's.

Weber told the congregation every person is created with certain gifts that make that person unique and special, and though it might feel like a void has been left when that person dies, part of that person will always be around.

"Though what we know of him is in the past, in the present he is still here, he is still with us," Weber said.

In attendance were Tim Stevenson and Kyle Brooks, who survived the crash that killed Steichen. Brooks, who had a healing collarbone and shoulder blade and his left arm in a sling, said he was still in the process of recovering from loss of short-term memory.

Stevenson, Brooks' cousin, was released from a New Mexico hospital without need for further treatment.

Also in attendance were Steichen's parents, John and Mary Sauber Steichen. They stood at the podium together, behind two poster boards decorated with 26 pictures of their son.

Mary Steichen said after she and her husband had learned about the wreck that killed their 23-year-old son, they both went for a walk.

"John kept saying to me, 'I'm so empty, I feel so alone,'" she said.

She thanked everyone who had sent their condolences through phone calls and cards, some from parents who had never known her son, but their children had.

"We have felt the hand of God through each and every one of you, and we thank you," she said.

She said she was able to separate the essence of her son from the body buried earlier in the month, and believed that the essence would never die.

"What made Nick Nick was not lying in the coffin," she said. "His spirit moved along, and it is alive."

John Steichen said all people have heroes, but before he became a father, he didn't have many. People like Babe Ruth, he said, didn't represent the qualities he admired as much as his six children.

"I've come to realize that my kids have become my heroes," he said.

Steven Steichen, Nick's older brother, was in attendance, but had to leave early with his wife, Kim. After the service, Mary Steichen said her 2-year-old granddaughter, Shelby, Steven's daughter, hadn't been to the service — and probably still didn't realize her uncle had died.

Shelby had been the apple of her son's eye, she said, and he had devoted much of his free time to looking after her while he was a kinesiology student at K-State. At his funeral, Shelby had stayed in the car with her other grandmother and was drawing on the foggy windows.

"Her grandmother asked, 'What are you doing?' And Shelby said, 'I'm drawing pictures for Uncle Nick,'" Steichen said.

Kaye Ness, who was vice president of Kinesiology Student Association when Nick Steichen was president, read letters from Steichen's lab partners and friends, about how he would make everyone laugh on the saddest days, about how he was always late to class and about how intelligent and well-rounded he was.

"He definitely made my college years a lot better," she said. "And I'll never forget him."

K-State scholarship established in Kassebaum's name

KELLY DICKSON
Kansas State Collegian

Nancy Kassebaum Baker's connection to the K-State campus will now directly benefit outstanding high school students. Seven incoming freshmen will receive a scholarship in her name.

"She is a very modest lady. It took some persuasion on our part," said Charles Reagan, executive assistant to K-State President Jon Wefald.

The scholarship, a one-time award worth $5,000, is for incoming freshmen. The funds come from various private donations. The recipients applied by filling out the regular K-State scholarship application by Nov. 1.

The scholarship's recipients were chosen based on course work and other kinds of involvement.

"We chose students from the applications by looking at academic achievement, including challenging courses," Beth Powers, scholarship adviser, said. "Test scores were a factor, a high level of leadership and involvement in community and high school."

After the initial scholarship application, another application with five questions was sent to applicants, said Mindy Weixelman, senior admissions representative for K-State.

"The questions were sent to students who have excellent academic and leadership skills. They are contributing members of their communities. And not only are involved in school activities, they are active leaders who have potential to be leaders at K-State," Weixelman said.

From the students who returned the questions, 17 were chosen for a one-day visit to K-State.

The students were allowed to design their own visit. They could talk to advisers and professors from their college or a representative from any organization they

Scholarship applications available for students interested in Arabian language, culture studies

Students interested in Arab studies have the chance to qualify for the Yamani Scholarships.

The scholarships, available through the College of Arts and Sciences, were introduced to K-State about 12 years ago under the guidance of Michael Suleiman, professor of political science.

Suleiman said it all began when the former Saudi Arabian Oil Minister Sheikh Ahmed Zaki Yamani came to Manhattan to give a Landon Lecture.

Suleiman said during this time, he talked with Yamani and helped him set up scholarships that would promote Arabian studies.

"The scholarships are to promote students to study about Arab, Muslim and American relationships," Suleiman said.

The scholarships also supply some money to support Arabic language instruction.

Sami Halabi, junior in political science and two-time scholarship winner, said Arabian studies are a big part of his life.

"I have a serious interest in studies in the Middle East and the Arabian language," Halabi said.

He said his interest in Arabian studies stems from the fact that his dad is Palestinian. His interest has continued here at K-State, where Halabi serves on the American-Arab anti-discrimination committee. Having class with Suleiman has also affected him.

"He's a great influence," Halabi said.

Halabi said the scholarships, which are normally up to $2,000, have been very helpful in promoting his studies.

"They financed my studies for the first two years of Arabian language and also my trip to Jerusalem in the summer of '96," Halabi said.

He said his involvement with Arabian culture will not end when he graduates. Rather, he hopes to make it the focus of his work.

"I want to work on water issues in the Middle East. Specifically on resolution conflict with water," Halabi said.

Both Halabi and Suleiman agreed the only way to qualify for the scholarships is to have an interest in Arab studies.

"The scholarships primarily go to students interested in studying about the Middle East and doing something to benefit that study," Suleiman said.

He also said taking some classes that focus on Arabian culture would be beneficial.

Halabi recommended talking to Suleiman early about the scholarships.

"Dr. Suleiman is always very anxious to talk to people about the scholarships," he said.

The Yamani Scholarships are available in the political science department, Waters 226. Application materials are due Feb. 16, and the announcement of the awards will be in March.

WORLDREPORT

Albright visits Arab countries to bolster support for possible military action against Iraq, Hussein

KUWAIT — Secretary of State Madeleine Albright assured Israel and its Arab neighbors Sunday the United States would have a swift and resounding response to any Iraqi attack in the region.

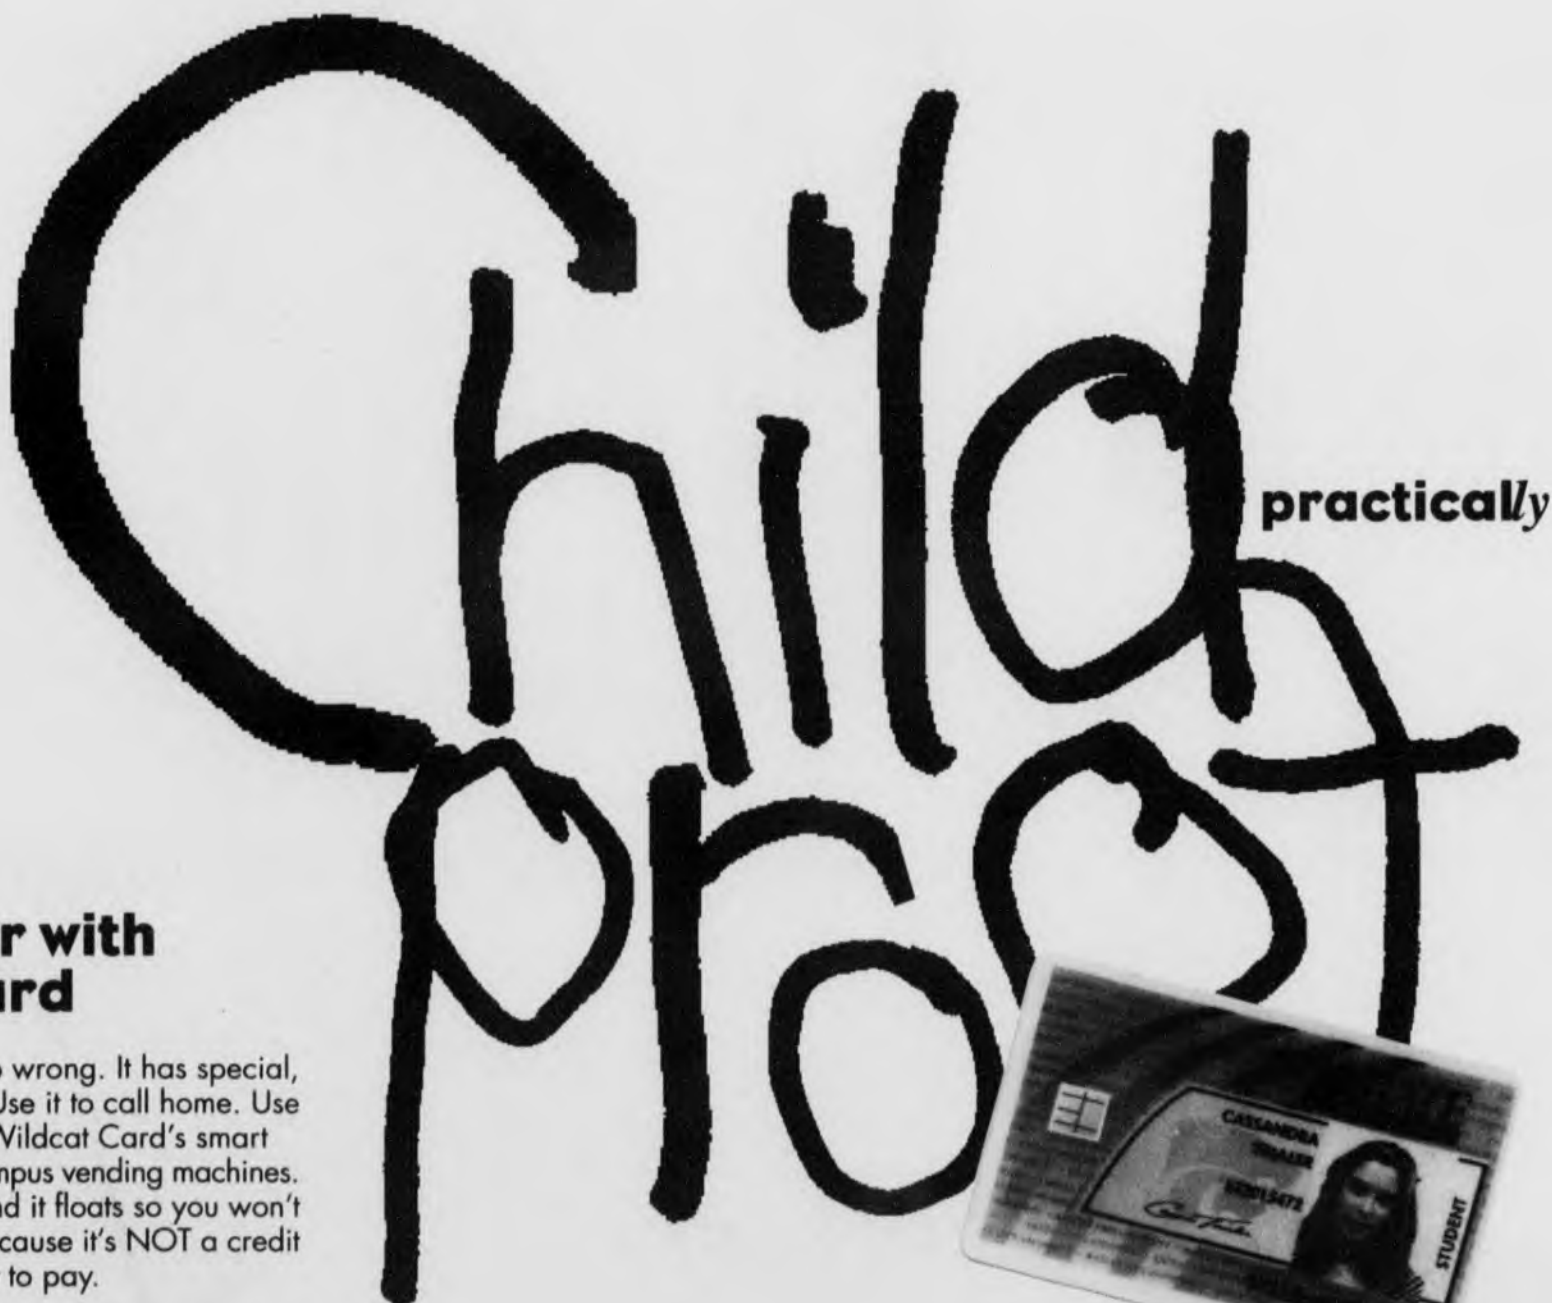

"The United States stands with you in the face of Saddam's latest threat," Albright told the Israeli people in a televised Jerusalem news conference.

She then flew to the Persian Gulf and gave the same message to leaders of Kuwait. She intends to repeat it today to government leaders in Saudi Arabia as part of a swing through the region to line up Arab support for possible military action against Iraq.

During the recent impasse between Iraq and the United Nations over weapons inspections, Baghdad has uttered no specific public threat of attack.

In 1990, most Arab countries — Jordan was noticeably in dissent — supported the successful U.S.-led invasion to liberate Kuwait. This time, the Arabs' stance is difficult to evaluate.

State Department officials said Kuwait and Jordan, whose King Hussein met Friday night in London with Albright, are backing the U.S. hard line toward Iraq. The officials insist that, privately, others are as well.

Black History Month to offer many events

► BSU MEMBERS HOPE ACTIVITIES WILL ATTRACT VARIETY OF STUDENTS.

BARBARA HOLLINGSWORTH
Kansas State Collegian

Black history isn't just for black students during Black History Month.

Colette McLemore, Black Student Union president and senior in social science, said students of all races should attend the 20 events planned for this month.

"You do each event with the hope there will be a diverse crowd," McLemore said.

McLemore said she looks forward to learning more about the Rev. Al Sharpton when he speaks Tuesday evening in McCain Auditorium.

"He has been so controversial with issues," McLemore said of Sharpton, who lost the New York mayoral race in the fall. "He's worked on some African-American issues that most people won't touch. I think it's going to be a really nice crowd, and we'll learn a little bit more about Rev. Al Sharpton because most of what we hear about him is from the media. The media slanders Sharpton big time."

Bringing Sharpton to K-State was a unanimous decision among the month's sponsors: Union Program Council, Office of Diversity and Dual Career Development, BSU, Delta Sigma Theta sorority, McCain Auditorium, Zeta Phi Beta sorority, KSU Alumni Association, Multicultural Student Organization's office, KSU Intercollegiate Athletics and the Department of Music.

"It's chaired by BSU, but each of those organizations are asked to put in input," McLemore said. "It's a lot of groups coming together to put on Black History Month. It's not just one organization."

The Alumni Association's workshop "African Americans in Business: The Path Toward Empowerment" on Feb. 10 perfectly fits the month's theme, said Tamara Abdulhaqq, assistant director of constituent programs for the Alumni Association.

The panel discussion will give students information on starting their own business through the help of local business owners, including an alumnus, a student and two community supporters.

"Last year, we did a workshop, and we had such a good response that people wanted us to do it again with more information," Abdulhaqq said. "Last year, the panelists gave their personal background. This year it will be more detailed information. At the end of the workshop, students can speak one-on-one with panelists during a reception." Beyond the Alumni Association's involvement, alumni themselves play a role in the month. Sunday's presentation featured LaFern Watkins, an alumna. Thursday's achievement banquet includes speaker and alumnus David Hall.

"He was a K-State athlete, and the reason we brought him back was because he was a black athlete who graduated from K-State at the lowest number of the number of athletes to graduate," McLemore said. "He graduated, and he was a lawyer and a dean at Northwestern University."

With the variety of speakers, students should be able to take at least one thing away from the month, McLemore said.

"You'd like for someone to get to learn something that they didn't know before, because a lot of times black history isn't taught," she said.

BSU to sponsor Sharpton speech

JOSHUA STURGILL
Kansas State Collegian

Black Student Union will sponsor a lecture by the Rev. Al Sharpton at 7 p.m. Tuesday in McCain Auditorium.

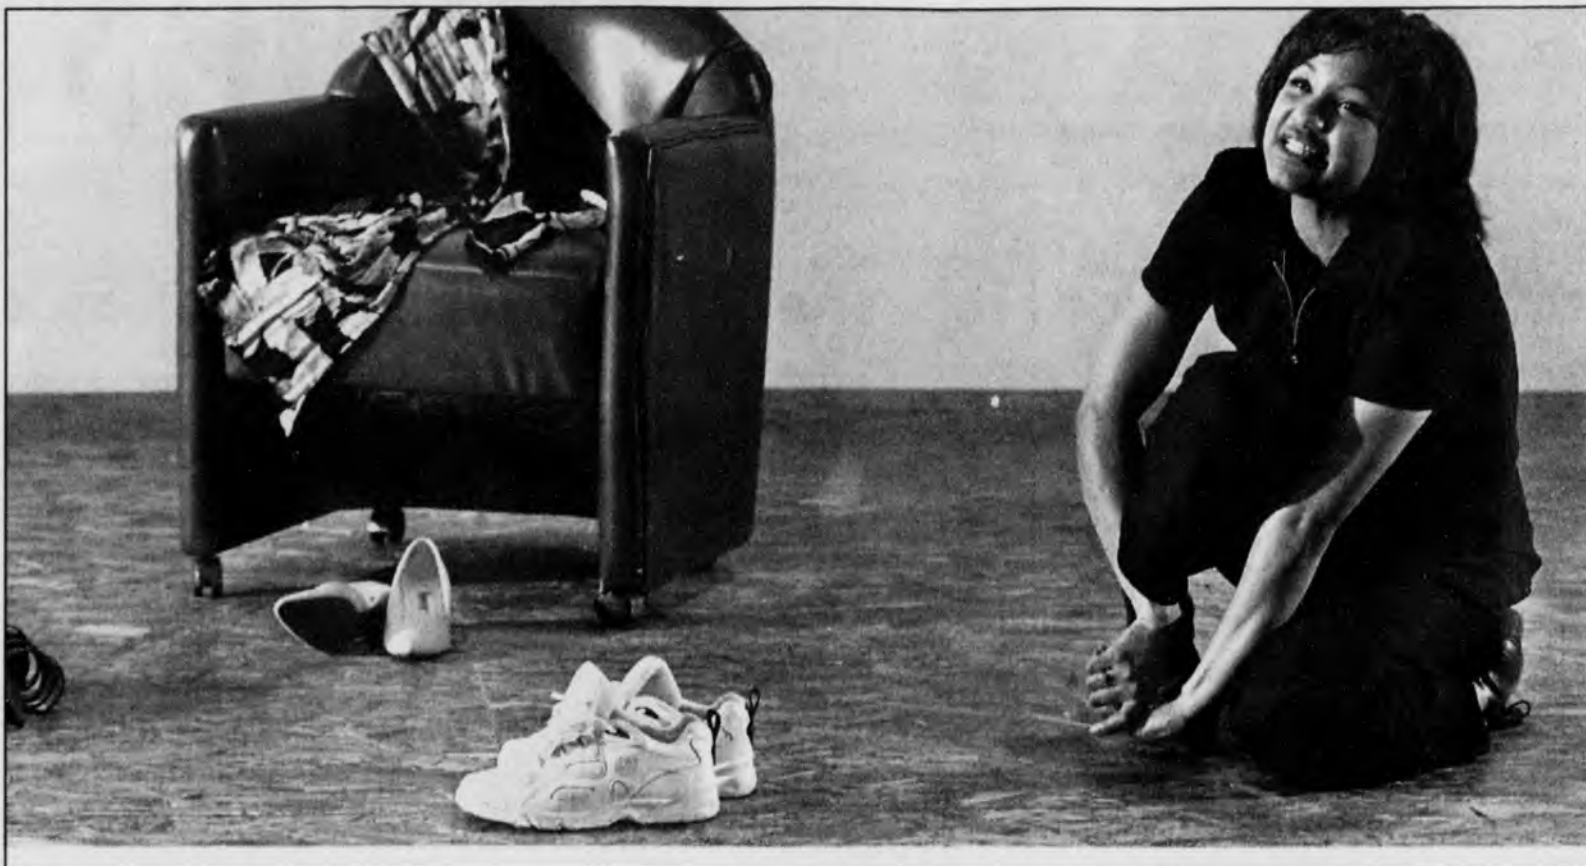

Sharpton, an influential civil rights activist and host of a weekly community forum, will deliver the speech in conjunction with Black History Month.

Sharpton is president of the National Action Network, an organization that promotes racial justice and the political and economic empowerment of minorities.

NAN has also set up a sexual harassment hot line and the Churches Adopt a School program.

This year's Black History Month theme is "Umoja Wajibu Amali: Unity Commitment Action."

K-STATE ALUMNA LAFERN WATKINS PERFORMS HER DRAMATIC PRESENTATION DURING THE "SET IT OFF" CELEBRATION SUNDAY NIGHT IN UNION STATION. SUNDAY NIGHT'S EVENT WAS THE OFFICIAL KICKOFF FOR BLACK HISTORY MONTH.

Play portrays lives of 4 black women

AMANDA DAVIDSON
Kansas State Collegian

Black History Month began Sunday with "Set it off," a performance by a K-State alumna.

LaFern Watkins is a 1993 K-State graduate in theater. Watkins performed a dramatic portrayal of four black women in different stages of their lives.

"This performance was a challenge to bring each character to life, tell their story and still keep the audience entertained," Watkins said.

Colette McLemore, president of Black Student Union, said she thought Watkins was the best performer to start Black History Month.

"We wanted to kick off Black History Month with an educational and entertaining performance," she said. "LaFern was our first choice because of her performances at K-State I knew she would entertain as well as bring in culture."

The performance was a mixture of original works and Pearl Cleage's writings.

"I chose to perform this piece because of its impact and the fact that it shows the injustices of black women throughout history to today," Watkins said.

Watkins' performance began with the character "Ooh Child." Ooh Child was a scared little girl who had lost her mother and did not understand her place in the world.

After portraying each character Watkins explained that each woman had different pairs of shoes they filled. "These shoes have seen many places and done different things," she said.

The second character was Ida B. Wells.

Watkins portrayed this enslaved older woman who was reflecting back on the harsh times before civil rights.

Watkins acted out the feelings of Wells when her friends were lynched and black children in her community went hungry.

Watkins then slipped into a third pair of shoes and became Ava Gardner Johnson. Johnson was in a bus terminal, talking with a strange lady who was giving her pointers on how to keep the men on the bus from harassing her. Watkins spun around the floor singing and dancing, showing Johnson's desire to be a performer.

Watkins then became Wells again, continuing the story about the injustices Wells faced throughout her life as a black journalist.

A fourth pair of shoes belonged to a young woman who wanted to become an actress, but she was not hired because of the color of her skin, her full lips and her wide hips. The woman, though criticized for her looks, said she was proud to be who she was and thought her looks were an asset.

Watkins brought the performance to a close when she used her character

Ooh Child to say that although rough roads were ahead she would always stay true to herself.

Ebony Clemons, member of BSU, said she enjoyed the performance. "LaFern is an excellent performer whose characters symbolize love and leadership," she said.

Watkins has been performing since 1993.

After graduating from K-State, Watkins started performing in the Phoenix Theater Circle in Columbus, Ohio. Later Watkins moved on to tour with the Karamu house in Cleveland. Watkins resides in Chicago and is working for Goodman Theatre, the largest theater company in Chicago. At Goodman Theatre, Watkins is performing "Blues for an Alabama Sky," by Cleage.

Four members of BSU — Adria Mills, Tiffany Lewis, Karyn Nesby and Stacy Yeager — also helped to kick off Black History Month by performing poetry and dramatic readings before Watkins' performance.

SGA hopefuls should be diverse, clear on campus issues

Before the Feb. 13 filing deadline, candidates entering the 1998 Student Governing Association election should contemplate the pivotal role they want to play in K-State's future.

We need more leaders who listen to students and break with the status quo to define the role of their office. Anyone can clutter the campus with neon posters and sidewalk chalk. It takes real leadership to back up great ideas with a realistic plan of action.

On this campus, leadership also means representing the interests of the students. The administration, while a valuable resource, will not get you elected or re-elected.

Rhetoric and politics only make for longer speeches. Keep it simple. Spell out specifically where you stand on issues. Tell us which ones matter to you. Tell us what projects will be the focus of your attention and energy. If students believe in what you support, they'll vote for you.

Campaign promises need to be just that — promises. Your word. Students expect you to follow through, and we'll be there watching to make sure you do.

Students interested in making a contribution to improving the quality and history of K-State should throw their hats into the ring. We encourage new people to get involved. The campus can only benefit from a greater diversity.

Mock candidates, while mildly entertaining, usually only serve to point out the foibles of real candidates. Be creative and have fun with your candidacy, but please, take the issues seriously.

The candidates most qualified to lead are good listeners. Leaders should confront complicated issues with innovative solutions and have a vision for the future of this campus.

Those seeking the coveted roles of student body president and vice president should be prepared to be a vocal presence on campus. The occupants of those offices should represent the entire student body and be active advocates. We should never have to guess where they stand on the important issues.

The Collegian is committed to fair, accurate and objective coverage of candidates and issues. This isn't a job we plan to do alone, though.

In the weeks ahead, we will be forming focus groups to discuss the issues you care about. Focus groups of student volunteers and leaders will help determine what issues should shape this year's election. Those interested in participating can e-mail the Collegian at collegian@ksu.edu.

If you work hard and take a stand on the issues that matter to you, you'll leave this campus better than you found it.

Elbow, Elbow, Wrist, Wrist

There's more to pageants than just the wave

LISA DETHLOFF
Lisa is a senior in political science. You can send e-mail to Lisa at batman@ksu.edu

It has taken me five years of practice, but I am now able to do the wave that is more famous than Queen Elizabeth's — the Miss America wave. It is the simple elbow, elbow, wrist, wrist, but the secret is to make sure that the arm does not cross over to the other side of the body. That is why we are blessed with two arms.

Yes, folks, for five years I have been involved with the highly entertaining world of scholarship pageants. No, rest assured I have not competed in a program.

If I ever did compete, I would be the first person in history to boycott the swimsuit portion, the evening gown would be a pink dress with puffed sleeves and I would spin plates on sticks like Phyllis Diller used to do on "Circus of the Stars" for the talent portion. Do you think my chances would be good to win the coveted title, wear the tiara and carry the scepter?

Next, you are probably asking, why do I call them scholarship pageants, not beauty pageants or even scholarship programs? Answer — if they were called beauty pageants, the competitors should never open their mouths and speak, and if the "scholarship program" term were used, the swimsuit would be eliminated. Plus, I have problems with my political correctness at times.

No, my role with scholarship pageants has consisted of supporting my favorite person and sibling in the world. Her journey to Atlantic City, N.J., began in high school by succeeding in the Kansas Junior Miss program and now working for the opportunity to compete for Miss Kansas.

As an insider in the world of sparkles and smiles, I have noticed many unusual things that go on. First of all, one of my roles is official clothes hanger, and I do not mean putting clothes on hangers, but having them literally hung on me while they are being tried on.

Sometimes I actually have indentations in my arms from the hangers poking me. That is the abusive role.

The next role is much more comfortable. I have to nod my head yes or no if I do or do not like an outfit. The comfort aspect is that the salesperson usually feels sorry for me when I have been standing for hours on end, so I get a nice cushy chair and read the latest Tom Clancy book while I wait, and wait, and wait.

If selecting the clothes is not enough, the accessories that must be purchased are so much fun to find. I never knew how difficult it would be to pick out earrings, hair clips and lapel pins. Why can't all the competitors just wear gold hoop earrings, have short hair and wear a lapel pin with the first letters of their first names?

Then the night of competition arrives, and the competitors go through an ordeal to capture that perfect princess-like image. The process of getting ready is not as simple as just wearing the clothes that took hours to find.

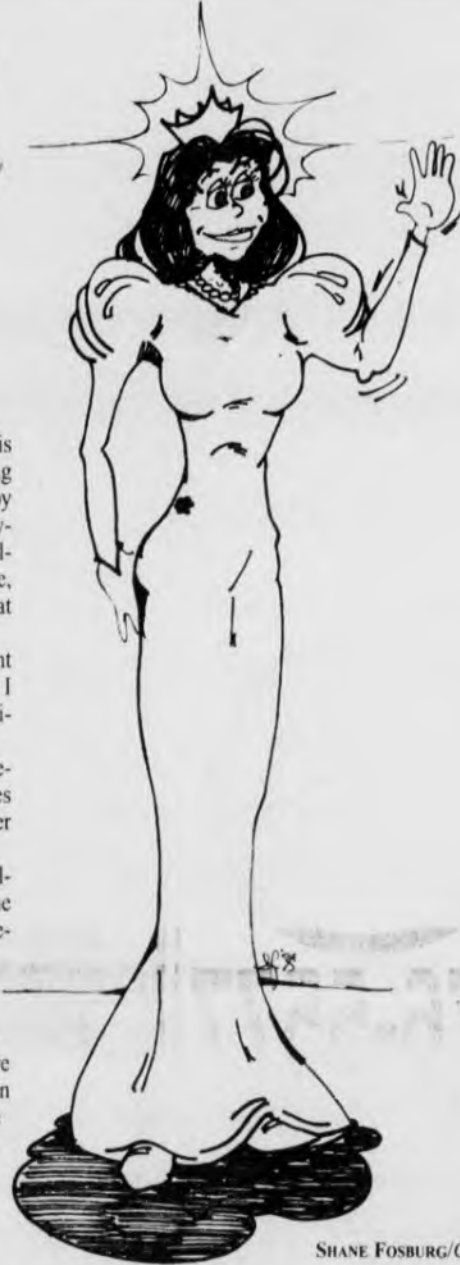

No, strange things happen. First the firm grip is applied so the swimsuit will not reveal anything shocking. Next, the mortuary make-up is used by some to cover up any blemishes ranging from everyday acne to the tattoo of the motorcycle on the shoulder. But the weirdest thing is the use of the duct tape, and I will let you use your own imagination on that one.

However, I greatly respect the scholarship pageant system no matter how many jokes I make or stories I tell. The women who compete go through many difficult hours of practice and preparation.

They practice relentlessly on their talent, sometimes working for a year or two on one piece. It takes discipline to play, sing or dance to the same thing over and over again.

Also, the pageants allow them to create and develop a platform on a critical issue. I have heard some great ideas on how to address mental health awareness, HIV prevention and illiteracy. Maybe Congress should pay attention.

The prize at the end of all of the sparkles and smiles is scholarship money. I cannot think of a better place, other than my own educational fund, where the money could be used. So the next time you turn on the television and see a woman being crowned as the next Miss So and So, remember she is working toward her goal. Are you?

Many life lessons learned on streets, not in classrooms

MARAY BURKE/Collegian

Looking back at my life reminds me where I came from and defines who I am. Looking back has allowed me to set a certain standard of goals so I have something to reach for.

This is what I have to do, because I live in two different worlds. There is the world where education is valued, and it's the norm. This is where I am most content and willing to participate. In the other world, education is devalued, dreams of higher education are just dreams and chances of leading a crime-free life are just that, chances.

This is the world where those who make it out rarely look back. This is where I hope to return and make a change. This is where I will be most content if I can help someone else.

I am lucky to attend a university, because I do not know where life's unfortunate roads might have led me. The odds seemed so stacked against me, even after being given a full-ride scholarship to any college in the world.

I still had fears that success was neither obtainable nor my destiny. At my high school, only half of all Latinos were graduating. Even with statistics saying an even smaller percentage of Latinos are in higher education or are going into higher education, my desire pushed me to believe I would make it.

Sometimes people tend to point the finger when they fail. They find fault in any system in which they are choked by hands that only allow them to breathe enough air to get by. I started to think, too, and act in this cancerlike way in which I found myself fighting everyone and felt everyone seemed to be fighting me. It is something undesirable that many people cannot identify.

I call it racism.

When we think of the word racism, images of white and black issues tend to flash in our minds. However, rarely are people capable of identifying racism when it is done toward white people.

For me, it seemed like the unfair game would never go my way. So I became privileged with offers of affirmative action, more minority scholarships and an all-too-accepting attitude that, "If I fail, it was because the system was unfair and played favoritism to a white world."

I talk about living in two worlds because higher education was thought of as something not obtainable in my neighborhood. It is a neighborhood where there are liquor stores every four or five blocks and where drug houses are easy to point out. A place where I too often heard the cries of racism by a white society when there were rarely any white people who crossed our paths.

For this I am taught an easy lesson that being a victim seems to be easier than trying and succeeding. In my neighborhood, if anyone failed, there was always the excuse of an unjust world.

If I anger you, I mean no harm. I am talking about my experiences in life where race should not matter. However, if the ideal place exists, it is far from my reach. I am bitter and angry because many of us know the world is an unfair place. Yet when we succeed, we did it on our own, and when we sometimes fail, it had something to do with race. There is a lesson to be taught with few minorities in higher education. The lesson is for those back at home, telling them if you did it, they can do it, too.

As I sit down and write about life's little experiences, I am reminded that everything should not revolve around race. To say the society we live in is racially separated is taboo, not to be spoken of because many people believe it is fair and unbiased — rewarding for those who work hard, the land of dreams and opportunities for all people, no matter what race they are.

Without a doubt, though, we still continue to segregate people because of their skin color. In fact, it is a two-way street when it comes to dealing with racism.

My hidden curriculum that taught me about racism was done through observation of my neighborhood and my experiences here at the university. I am taught a new lesson every time I go home where few escape a life of poverty, illiteracy, drugs and crime. The lesson is easily outlined: We who make it should not and could not turn our backs on our communities and blame white society for the illness that continues to plague and hurt our communities.

The illnesses of illiteracy, poverty and drugs should be only an obstacle that one might endure and can no longer be tolerated as an excuse for failure. If those of us in higher education gave back to our own communities, I believe the number of minorities across all college campuses could increase.

Ironically, I have seen too many who have made it and never looked back to see if anyone else needed help.

If more positive role models came back to my neighborhood after going on to higher education, at least other youth might have been inspired to see education as a way out of a life of poverty and illiteracy.

Maybe the blame that stereotypes white society for holding people down could be broken, and our communities would be accountable. The push further forward to increase higher education in the minority communities needs to start with those who have made it this far.

It has been five years since I began my journey through higher education. I have reflected a little on what I have learned. Unfortunately, some important lessons we learn are not always learned by sitting at a desk in a classroom where one person teaches and we, the students, sit and take notes. It seems the most important lessons one can learn or be taught are lessons through life experiences and observations.

Judgment of Clinton wasted on scandals

Editor,

Being an Arkansas native who grew up watching Bill Clinton govern, I must admit that I've found the past couple of weeks more humorous and bizarre than horrible and scandalous. Based on recent "Viewpoint" comments, however, Paul Robben seems to disagree. Robben stated that "shading the truth stands as one of the most repulsive abuses of the public trust imaginable."

I wish his statement were heartfelt hyperbole, but I think Robben's Puritanism was shining through, or perhaps he just doesn't have an active imagination. My threshold for "repulsive abuses" is a bit higher (Watergate, Iran-Contra). Given the president's 68-percent job approval rate, it appears I'm not alone.

Robben also wrote, "Bill Clinton's deeds have rarely matched the rhetoric." I guess when you don't like what's being said, it doesn't matter what the content of the message is.

When Clinton speaks out about issues important to families and a few of the results are the Family Leave Act, greater access to student loans and scholarships, an increase in the minimum wage, a cleaner environment and a balanced budget, I can see your outrage, Paul. Or, perhaps, I should say, "I feel your pain."

Of course, the humor and irony of this sordid little political drama aren't lost on me. If Clinton had settled his lawsuit with Paula Jones, it's doubtful these sexual allegations would have even been aired, and we would not have been cursed with having to listen to Ted Koppel or Cokie Roberts discuss oral sex on television. Believe me, that was way too frightening. I've always thought Clinton should have settled the lawsuit with Jones long ago, anyway. Not because I believe her case to be strong or credible, but rather so she could take the money and get a nose job. Seriously. It's possible that rather than actually seeing the president's penis, Jones simply caught a glimpse of herself in the mirror. When the dirt settles, her conservative supporters should really pony up the cash for the rhinoplasty.

Call me nostalgic, but I long for the days when "Deep Throat" was just a political metaphor. I'm not certain why so many scandal-mongers are obsessed with the "sexploits" of any president. Knowledge of past presidents fathering illegitimate children or having affairs doesn't help me pay my tuition or educate our nation's children. And if accounts of President Kennedy having lines of women into the Oval Office that dwarfed the ones at Disneyland diminishes your view of public service, so be it.

I'm also not sure what to think of Monica Lewinsky (or "Lewdinsky," as one friend calls her), other than she has really poor taste in friends. Her alleged forged letter and "I'm going to get my presidential x" comment certainly don't help her credibility, but Clinton's has always been on shaky ground as well.

Robben suggests that we know

Clinton probably dumped Lewinsky "like a sack of bricks." Putting Robben's poetic license aside, we really don't know much at all, unless allegations and innuendo meet your threshold for truth.

Until everything gets laundered (and, by the way, they didn't find any presidential DNA on Lewinsky's dress), I guess all we should do is withhold judgment and wait to see what falls out. In the meantime, I'm going to treat the president's sex life like I do my parents' — I'm not going to think about it.

were interested in knowing more about. The students had interviews with a panel and attended a reception.

"Dr. Charles Reagan gave a speech about the intellectual climate at K-State. We also called on students and faculty to talk about their experiences at K-State," Powers said.

Reagan explained why an unexamined life is not worth living and how a liberal arts education can help students. He gave the three purposes of education — to know oneself, to be able to make informed decisions and to be able to play a meaningful part in a democracy.

"You need to have an education to answer the questions and address the issues we are facing today. Things like welfare, voting, sexual morality and abortion," Reagan said.

This is the only K-State scholarship that requires an interview. The interviews were 15 minutes long and were conducted by a panel of faculty members from a variety of colleges and disciplines.

"They were asked a variety of questions designed to help us learn more about them. Things like what issues are important to them in their high school and community, who is their hero and their greatest achievement," Powers said.

The selection of students was not focused on only Kansas residents who applied or on big-city students vs. small-town students. When selecting the candidates it was taken into consideration that students from small towns could have had more opportunities to get involved in their school than students from metropolitan cities.

All 17 of the Kassebaum finalists have won other scholarships from K-State. The Kassebaum Scholarship will benefit the recipients in many other ways than money for an education.

"I think it will help me after college because I met the other finalists and we had a lot of common interests. Hopefully I will be able to network with those people and we can help each other in our endeavors," Megan Christensen, senior at Blue Valley High School said. "I also had the opportunity to meet faculty at K-State, and I hope to get a chance to work with them in the future."

Throughout this one-day visit the goal was to make a lasting impression on the students and to try to get them to come to K-State.

"The number one reason I want to go to K-State is the atmosphere and the people I talked to. They made me feel like I am a person to them and not just a number. The other places I have talked to will take my money and run, and I become just a number in the stats," said Paul Seger, senior at Haxtun High School and Kassebaum recipient.

Punxsutawney Phil set to decide weather agenda for 1998

ASSOCIATED PRESS

PUNXSUTAWNEY, Pa. — Balmy weather on the first day of February made it seem like spring was not far off. But the final word on that was due to come this morning when Punxsutawney Phil emerged from his lair.

If Phil succeeds in not seeing his shadow at sunrise, then spring is right around the corner.

But the whiskered meteorologist has seen no shadow just 12 times in 111 years, leaving some locals to hope he'll lie if things turn out otherwise.

"He can say he doesn't see his shadow," Marty Dunlap of Greenville said.

"Or, it's six more weeks of winter."

Records from the National Climatic Data Center in Asheville, N.C., show Phil's accuracy rate since 1980 to be about 59 percent.

But this could be a no-shadow year, since an average February day in Punxsutawney hovers around 26 degrees — about half of Sunday's balmy 50.

Folks take the rotund critter seriously in Punxsutawney, 80 miles northeast of Pittsburgh.

Store after store along the 6,800-population town's business district overflowed with shoppers Sunday. Even the town's chamber of commerce opened for retail, selling racks of clothes and trinkets. High school students hawked T-shirts on street corners. Cash registers rang up the sound of Phil-mania.

"The town has capitalized on it," said Bill Fusco, president of Punxsutawney's Lion's Club. "If this wasn't the Sunday before Groundhog Day, you wouldn't see a car parked along here."

Groundhog Day is rooted in a German superstition that if an animal casts a shadow on Feb. 2 — the Christian holiday of Candlemas — bad weather is coming.

What German settlers started in Punxsutawney 112 years ago, the top-hatted members of the Groundhog Club's Inner Circle continue when they pull Phil from a custom-made burrow at Gobbler's Knob, a wooded hill south of town.

If Dunlap really wants to ensure a quick spring, he should lobby the Inner Circle's 15 members.

The group plans the annual festivities and decides whether Phil will see his shadow.

Club members explain this, saying they translate Phil's prediction from the animal's native language, "Groundhogese."

SPORTS ROUND-UP

Sports Round-up is your daily dose of the latest scores, stats and news from the world of sports outside of K-State. Compiled from Associated Press reports.

Oldest player in Pro Bowl history leads AFC to comeback victory, 29-24, over rival NFC

HONOLULU — Warren Moon, at 41 the oldest Pro Bowl player and chosen for the game only because John Elway pulled out, led a late rally as the AFC came back Sunday to take a 29-24 Pro Bowl victory over the NFC.

The AFC trailed 21-7 at halftime after San Francisco's Steve Young threw a pair of touchdown passes for the NFC.

The Seahawks' Moon, who first practiced with the all-stars on Thursday, guided the AFC to a field goal and a pair of touchdowns in the fourth quarter.

He scored the go-ahead TD himself on a one-yard quarterback sneak with 1:49 remaining.

The AFC cashed on a pair of fourth-quarter fumbles, by Tampa Bay's Warrick Dunn and Atlanta's Chris Chandler, for its two late touchdowns.

Seattle's Darryl Williams recovered Dunn's fumble at the AFC 49, and Moon, appearing in his ninth Pro Bowl, engineered a 51-yard scoring drive that pulled the AFC to 24-23 with 2:31 remaining. After Tennessee's Eddie George scored on a four-yard run, Moon threw incomplete on the two-point conversion try.

The AFC got the ball back 12 seconds later, with Seattle's Michael Sinclair recovering Chandler's fumble at the NFC 16.

After George netted 15 yards on three carries, Moon scored to give the AFC the lead for the first time in the game.

Moon, four years older than anyone else in the game, played only the fourth quarter and completed four-of-eight for 89 yards, including a 57-yarder to Oakland's Tim Brown to set up George's TD run.

Brown wound up with five catches for 129 yards.

Jacksonville's Mike Hollis kicked a 48-yard field goal with 8:51 remaining to cut the NFC lead to 24-17.

New England's Drew Bledsoe pulled the AFC to 21-14 when he connected with Jacksonville's Jimmy Smith for a 14-yard score in the third quarter.

Denver running back Terrell Davis, the MVP in the Broncos' 31-24 Super Bowl victory over Green Bay, left the all-star game early in the second quarter with a strained left hamstring and did not return. Davis carried six times for 27 yards before he was hurt.

For the first time in memory, if not Pro Bowl history, two players were ejected for fighting: Denver's defensive end Neil Smith of the AFC and Minnesota tackle Todd Steussie. The two even continued jawing at each other as they left the field and headed to their respective locker rooms.

Sunday's Top 20 Capsules

No. 1 Duke 90, Georgia Tech 69

DURHAM, N.C. — Roshown McLeod scored 23 points as No. 1 Duke beat Georgia Tech 90-69 Sunday for its 11th straight win, setting up a No. 1 vs. No. 2 matchup with North Carolina.

Thursday's meeting at Chapel Hill will be the first game between the nation's top ranked teams since Kentucky beat Massachusetts in the semifinals of the 1996 Final Four and the 14th 1-2 meeting since 1980.

The Blue Devils (20-1, 9-0 Atlantic Coast Conference) are off to their best start in the Atlantic Coast Conference since starting 10-0 in the 1963-64 season under Vic Bubas.

McLeod's point total was two off his career high set earlier this season at Florida State, while Trajan Langdon added 17 as Duke moved to 74-8 under Mike Krzyzewski when ranked No. 1.

Dion Glover scored 20 points and Matt Harpring added 19 for Georgia Tech (13-8, 2-6), which has lost its last four league games.

No. 14 New Mexico 77, No. 3 Utah 74

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. — Royce Olney hit a three-pointer with 4.6 seconds left, capping New Mexico's late rally and sending Utah to its first loss of the season.

Utah, the nation's last remaining undefeated Division I team, had one final chance to force overtime. Drew Hansen's three-pointer swished through, but the officials ruled the ball had not left his hands when the clock expired.

Olney finished with 22 points as New Mexico (16-3, 6-1 Western Athletic Conference) overcame a 73-67 deficit in the final 1:27.

Andre Miller scored 24 points to lead Utah (18-1, 6-1), which had its school-record winning streak ended at 18.

No. 5 Kansas 82, Nebraska 71

LINCOLN, Neb. — Paul Pierce scored 27 points, Raef LaFrentz had 25 and Kansas held off Nebraska's second-half three-point flurry to win its eighth straight over the Cornhuskers.

Billy Thomas had 10 points, including consecutive baskets near the two-minute mark to give the Jayhawks (24-3, 8-1 Big 12) a 72-65 lead.

Cookie Belcher scored on a drive for the Cornhuskers (13-8, 4-4) before Pierce hit two free throws.

Nebraska's Troy Piatkowski hit his fifth three-pointer of the second half with 1:15 to play, trimming the margin to 74-70. But the Huskers missed their last five shots, sealing the win for Kansas.

Piatkowski led Nebraska with 18 points.

Florida 86, No. 7 Kentucky 78

LEXINGTON, Ky. — Jason Williams and Kenyan Weakley each scored 24 points as Florida hit 12 three-pointers, the most ever by a Kentucky opponent in Rupp Arena.

Florida (11-7, 4-4 Southeastern Conference) snapped a 10-game losing streak to Kentucky and won in Rupp Arena for the first time since Feb. 12, 1989.

Cameron Mills also turned in a scintillating shooting performance, hitting 8-of-14 shots from beyond the three-point arc in finishing with a career-high 31 points for Kentucky (19-3, 8-1).

No. 13 South Carolina 67, No. 18 Cincinnati 65

COLUMBIA, S.C. — Antonio Grant hit a desperation three-pointer as time expired, capping South Carolina's comeback from a 23-point deficit.

Grant picked up a loose ball with the clock ticking down and launched a prayer that swished through as the horn sounded, setting off a raucous celebration that spilled into press row and brought dozens of fans streaming onto the court.

No. 19 Michigan 80, No. 16 Iowa 66

IOWA CITY, Iowa — Louis Bullock scored 21 points, including five three-pointers, as Michigan handed Iowa its fourth straight defeat.

Jerod Ward scored 18 points, Robert Traylor 15 and Maceo Baston 13 for the Wolverines (16-6, 6-3 Big Ten), who snapped a two-game losing streak and won at Carver-Hawkeye Arena for the first time in four games.

No. 20 Syracuse 84, Pittsburgh 73

PITTSBURGH — Todd Burgan scored seven of his 27 points in a 16-0 run at the start of the second half to carry Syracuse.

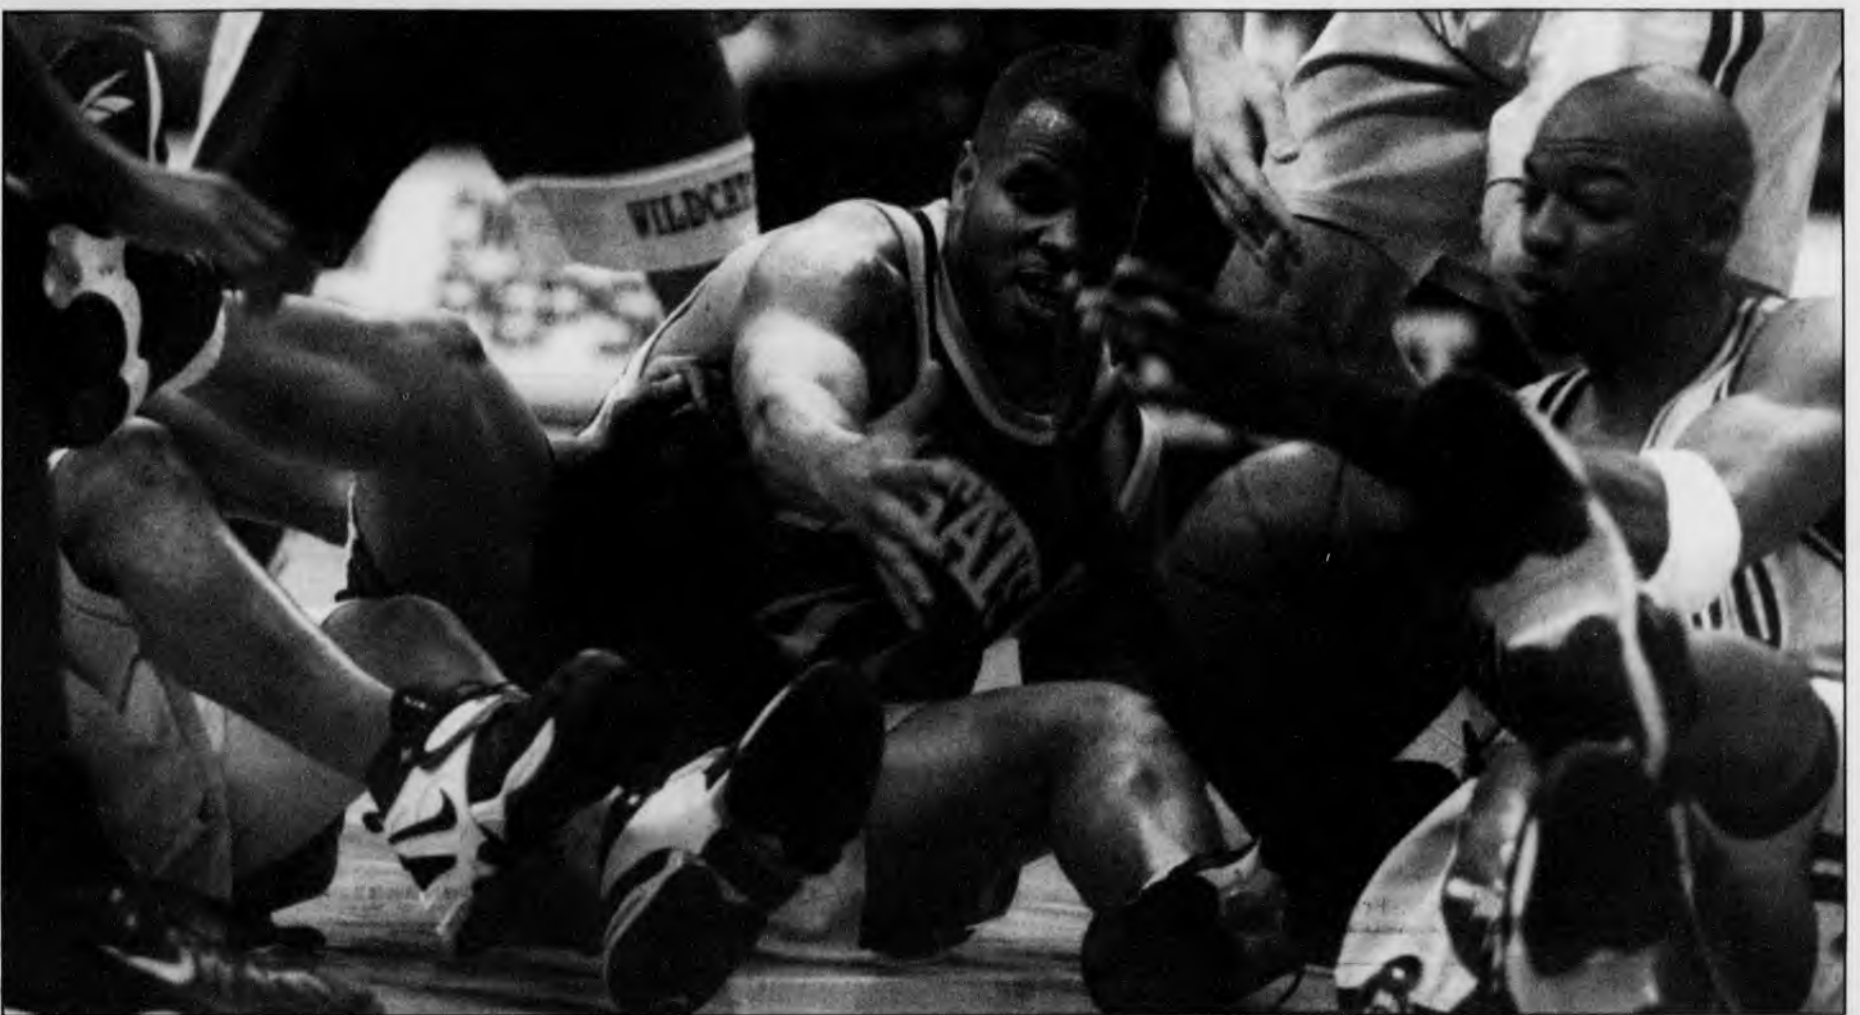

The Orangemen (17-4, 7-3 Big East), who led 29-28 at halftime, took advantage of Pittsburgh turnovers on four consecutive possessions and scored 16 straight points in the first 3:55 of the second half.

Colorado keeps men's team winless in Big 12 road games

SAM FELSENFELD
Kansas State Collegian

As losers of all 12 Big 12 Conference road games in K-State history, the K-State men's basketball team went to Colorado Saturday looking to catch a break and start a new trend.

But game No. 13 was anything but lucky for the Wildcats, who lost to the Buffaloes, 77-66.

"We stunk. I know we were emotionally ready. I thought we were ready to play," K-State Coach Tom Asbury said. "But we didn't match their intensity during the course of the game."

The loss drops the Cats to 13-6, 4-5 in Big 12 play. It also evened K-State's season series with the Buffs, who lost to the Cats 78-60 on Jan. 25.

"We took it personal, to show them that last weekend was just a fluke and we really can play better," Colorado center Charlie Melvin said.

During the game, the Cats held the lead only twice — 8-6 in the first half and 51-50 in the second — for a total of 2:53.

K-State, which shot only 27.6 percent in the first half, trailed 30-21 at the break and fell behind 42-28 early in the second half. But the Cats, led by forward Shawn Rhodes, went on a 15-2 run to close the gap to 44-43.

Rhodes scored 11 points during the run in less than three minutes. Those points, however, were Rhodes' only during 22 minutes of playing time.

The Buffs and Cats traded points for a couple minutes, but with 9:18 remaining in the game, forward Manny Dies sank two free throws to put the Cats up 51-50. But the Buffs went on a 10-0 run to put the game away. K-State couldn't pull closer than five the rest of the way.

"This is one of our better, more complete games," Colorado Coach Ricardo Patton said. "Kansas State did a good job of coming back in

Women's team succumbs, 56-52

SAM FELSENFELD
Kansas State Collegian

Offensively, the K-State women's basketball team held its own at Colorado Saturday, posting higher field-goal and three-point percentages and hitting six more shots than the Buffaloes.

The Wildcats also grabbed more defensive rebounds than the Buffs.

But foul trouble and depth problems ended the Cats' hopes of sweeping their regular-season series with Buffs, as Colorado won 56-52.

The Cats committed 24 personal fouls and one technical, letting the Buffs attempt 22 more free throws. The Buffs scored 16 more points from the line than K-State, and with three Cats fouling out — sophomore forward Nicky Ramage, freshman forward Brandy Harris and senior guard Brit Jacobson — K-State Coach Deb Patterson only had six players to choose from during the final 3:05 of the game.

"We have got to learn to play aggressively and not get in foul trouble, and we've got to compete in the paint," Patterson said. "I felt as though we had an opportunity to line up here and compete for a win. I thought we lined up well the first time we played this team."

K-State controlled most of the game, leading for nearly 22 straight minutes.

But during a stretch of 1:47 with less than eight minutes remaining in the half, the Buffs went on a 9-0 run and took control the rest of the way.

"I think we played a good game," Patterson said. "To compete so hard and have so many players in foul trouble is a tough thing to deal with. It's a reality, though."

The loss dropped the Cats to 9-9 overall, 3-5 in Big 12 play and 0-4 in conference road games.

"We've got to find a way to stay in games, stay on the floor, and give ourselves an opportunity to win on the road," Patterson said.

With only four reserves, Patterson played

Kansas Jayhawks set to ruin K-State's Valentine's Day dreams of upset

Love will become the merciless twist of a dagger inserted directly into the heart of our men's basketball team this Saint Valentine's Day.

Yep, on Feb. 14 the Kansas Jayhawks will burst into Bramlage Coliseum and take the Cats to the rack over and over again.

Jayhawks 67, Cats 62. Bank on it.

It's the same sad song year after year. KU waltzes into the lifeless dump we affectionately call Bramlage and they reach into Willie's chest, pull out his heart and feed it to that big blue bird they always seem to bring with them. Then all us K-Staters utter the weak retort, "Wait until football season." It's becoming pitiful.

Now, I know it's a bit early to start talking about this. After all, Feb. 14 is still a long way off. But I feel compelled to scream about the best-kept secret on this campus.

Does anybody reading this column know how many years, how many decades, how many seasons or how many games have passed since the K-State men's basketball team managed to beat the Kansas Jayhawks in Manhattan?

Please allow me tell you, because the truth ain't pretty.

The year was 1983. It comes down to 14 straight games. Get this — Ronald Reagan was the president of the United States. Non-traditional students aside, every one of us was picking our noses in elementary school.

The last time the Cats defeated the Hawks in Manhattan, the Cats were playing in Ahearn Field House. That means our basketball team has never, ever beaten the Hawks in Bramlage.

You want to know why our Cats have never beaten the Jayhawks in Bramlage? Because Bramlage lacks tradition. Bramlage lacks noise. In fact, it's downright sad watching a game in Bramlage.

If you travel to Allen Fieldhouse you get goose bumps, it's so loud. To our south, both Oklahoma schools have caused people to go deaf from the noise.

Here in Manhattan, we sit and watch in silence.

Your Cats are undefeated at home this year, and not one game has sold out. C'mon, these aren't the same guys that stunk it up last year. Shell out a couple of bucks and make some noise.

My apologies to the die-hard fans who sit up front wearing the zebra stripes. Rest assured, I'm not talking about you guys.

To be sure, the Jayhawks aren't intimidated when they travel down Interstate 70 to the friendly confines of Bramlage. Why would they be? After all, they have never lost a game in Bramlage. I'd wager 15 percent of the crowd is Jayhawk-friendly when the ball is cast into the air for the tipoff.

Do you think for one instant that happened when the Cats went there to play?

Not on your life, baby. Not on your life.

You see, games in Bramlage mean nothing. Sure, the Cats are 10-0 at home this year. Sure, the most they have trailed at home this year in a Big 12 game is by one point against Nebraska. But it doesn't mean anything until the Cats finally end the streak and kick the Jayhawks' butts.

Maybe then you'll believe in our basketball team again. Maybe then you'll skip class and drive to the Big 12 Tournament.

Or, maybe when the Cats do lose on Feb. 14, you'll not only jump off the bandwagon you jumped on at the start of the Kansas vs. K-State game, but you'll set the wagon on fire on your way home.

Things like fair-weather fans didn't exist when the Cats played in Ahearn. They couldn't get seats. When the Cats used to shoot the rock in Ahearn, the place was alive with excitement. The bleachers used to shake because of the fans stomping their feet.

Between 1950 and 1988, the Cats were 377-86. It was one of the toughest places to win a basketball game for any visiting team. It just reeked of tradition. But the place only seated 11,220 after fire codes reduced the maximum capacity. My guess is the administration saw an old building with limited money-making ability.

Let's explore the administration's thoughts on dumping Ahearn for the modern and empty Bramlage, anyway.

Administrator 1: "Guys, we have a problem. We have this phenomenal gym where the bleachers shake, your ears ring, your voice is hoarse after games, the Cats sell out game after game, it's rich in tradition and it's regarded as one of the toughest places to play college basketball in the nation."

Administrator 2: "Hey, I have a great idea! Let's build a gym well away from campus by the football stadium. We can make it bigger and modern, that way we'll never sell it out, and if we're lucky we'll never beat our arch-rival Kansas at home again."

Administrator 1: "A splendid idea."

Sorry to be so sarcastic. I'm just a little miffed about having to watch pretty good basketball games in a relatively silent gym. Although I will concede that the game against Nebraska last Wednesday was loud for very small amounts of time. That may have had something to do with the presentation of the Fiesta Bowl Trophy at halftime.

I'm not a cheerleader for our basketball team. Frankly, I don't care if you show up to watch them. But I will wager you'll be there for the KU game.

In the meantime, a mediocre basketball team is slowly becoming something special — an NCAA Tournament sleeper.

Can you say Sweet 16?

the second half, but our guys kept their composure and stayed poised down the stretch."

Colorado, in addition to posting better final numbers on the scoreboard than the Cats, out-performed K-State in nearly every statistical category.

The Buffs had a higher field-goal percentage, were stronger from the free-throw line, out-rebounded the Cats and had better three-point accuracy.

Also, Colorado's field-goal percentage was higher from outside the three-point arc than inside.

Still, Asbury was more disappointed with K-State's performance than he was impressed by Colorado's play.

"These guys are good," Asbury said.

"But believe me, they're not that good."

Dies led the Cats with 25 points and 10 rebounds, including five off the offensive glass. It was the fourth time in six games that he scored at least 25, and it was the third consecutive game, and seventh on the season, that he recorded a double-double.

However, Asbury said Dies could have played better.

"Manny didn't guard anybody, he didn't rebound and he didn't box anybody off," Asbury said. "I'm not overly enamored with his performance. He should be able to score on these guys."

Forward Kenny Price led the Buffs with 22 points and four three-pointers, while forward Ronnie DeGray added 20 and grabbed a game-high 14 boards, including eight offensive.

three starters on a 40-minute pace.

Junior forward Jenny Coalson and freshman point guard Kim Woodlee didn't leave the game. Also, Jacobson played all 20 minutes of the first half, and despite picking up her fourth foul 4:57 into the second half, wasn't substituted until the 11:38 mark.

Patterson said it was a dangerous decision to keep Jacobson in the game, but it was necessary to keep the Cats competitive.

"Playing with four fouls, playing on the back line of that defense and playing on a 40-minute pace, it definitely is Russian roulette," Patterson said.

Playing Jacobson also softened the defense a little. Immediately after she picked up her fourth foul, the Buffs went after her. When play resumed after the foul, it only took four seconds for Colorado forward Shelley Garcia to drive on Jacobson, who couldn't risk playing too aggressively.

Ramage was the first to foul out for the Cats, doing so with 8:52 remaining and the Cats leading 40-34. Two minutes later, with K-State up 42-38, Harris fouled out.

At the time, the Cats had held momentum for most of the game. But on the play, Harris was also whistled for a technical foul for slamming the ball down out of frustration.

Colorado's LaShena Graham hit three of four free throws, pulling the Buffs within one and giving them momentum that carried them to the victory.

Harris led the Cats with 11 points and Coalson grabbed a game-high 10 rebounds.

Defensively, the Cats held Colorado to 33-percent shooting using zone defenses exclusively, a move Patterson attributed to depth and experience problems.

"It's difficult, when you have two freshmen and a sophomore on the floor, to rely on the players having the ability to go one-on-one," she said.

But Colorado Coach Ceal Barry said the move worked.

"They play good defense. It's a defense we don't see often," Barry said. "If we play them in the Big 12 Tournament, we have to shoot better than 33 percent."

Intramural basketball kicks off; rule changes instituted for season

CHARLEY MORASCH
Kansas State Collegian

Whistles blew, players hustled up and down the court and the sounds of basketballs being dribbled and nets swishing were heard throughout the night.

But this wasn't another win by the K-State men's basketball team in Bramlage Coliseum. On Thursday night, intramural basketball started at the Chester E. Peters Recreational Center.

Participation in Rec basketball has consistently been good, and Steve Martini, intramural director, said this year is no different.

"Three hundred thirty-five teams are signed up," Martini said. "We have a good number of teams, and almost all the slots are filled."

Because there are so many teams and games will go on during the evening, anyone wanting to play on their own is advised to play when intramural games are not being played.

"The games will take five courts, which leaves five others for people to shoot on," Martini said.

Intramural basketball takes place on Sundays through Thursdays. Games will take place on Sunday from 1 to 11 p.m.

On Mondays and Tuesdays, games will be played from 5 to 11 p.m. and Wednesday and Thursday games will be from 6 to 11 p.m.

Teams will play one night a week until March 5, the last day of the season. The following Sunday, playoffs will start and should finish by spring break. Any team with at least a .500 win/loss record will qualify for the playoffs.

One area of concern is participants playing on two different men's teams, which is against the rules.

"If you play on two different teams, one of the two teams must forfeit every game you have played in," Martini said.

All games follow the Kansas State High School Athletics Association rulebook, which has one important change this year. While a free throw is being shot, players cannot come into the lane until the ball hits the rim or backboard.

Spectators are encouraged to come and cheer for their friends.

"Anyone can come and watch," Martini said. "As long as they have their student ID and are dressed in street clothes. We've got bleachers and places to sit."

Committee educates, counsels students about AIDS, STDs

►GROUP TO INFORM, PROMOTE DISEASE AWARENESS AT K-STATE THROUGH CAMPUS PROGRAMS.

JILL BUTLER
Kansas State Collegian

The chair of K-State's Communicable Disease Committee said the CDC exists as part of a continuing effort to organize K-State campus groups so they can educate others about AIDS.

"Our main goal as a group is to promote awareness and educate others about AIDS and AIDS-related projects on campus," Don Fallon, K-State's CDC chair, said. "We support and care for those facing the AIDS disease through nurses, doctors, legal support and counseling."

The committee consists of members of groups including University Counseling Services, Lafene Health Center, Greek Affairs, Housing and Dining, K-State Student Union and the Regional AIDS Project.

Fallon has also been involved in memorial services and has given pastoral care and counseling to the families.

"We don't just educate, we also counsel and give support to the HIV/AIDS patients and families," Fallon said.

The committee also meets to plan programs to educate and discuss policies.

"Some of our best programs involve AIDS patients and their parents," Fallon said.

Members of the committee from University Counseling Services said they are involved with the committee because they have patients who need to see them about diseases.

"We are a direct service that students come to when they have AIDS, herpes and chlamydia," said Dori Lambert, assistant director of clinical services at University Counseling Services. "We go to the committee meetings because they are a coordinated effort on campus as a whole to inform and educate about AIDS and other STDs."

Lambert said that everyone must be aware and ready for what may happen before it happens.

"If you are only aware in a time of crisis, you aren't able to handle the problems when they happen," Lambert said.

"We aim as a committee to educate each other so everyone knows what's happening on campus, and so we'll be ready as a whole to help."

Members of the Regional AIDS Project also attend the committee meetings.

"Our project, known as RAP, works in the community with AIDS patients and families and then we come together with the committee on campus to collaborate on different events," said Greg Eiselein, volunteer member of RAP.

"Like during World AIDS Week, we didn't compete. We came together as a group to organize events for the week."

Committee members also provide educational programs, off-campus resources and K-State resources to students dealing with AIDS and sexually transmitted diseases.

TWO SCREENS OF "THE WIZARD OF OZ," PINK FLOYD'S "THE DARK SIDE OF THE MOON" AND INTRICATE LASER DISPLAYS ALL COMBINED FRIDAY NIGHT IN BRAMLAGE COLISEUM FOR THE "DARK SIDE OF THE RAINBOW" SHOW.

CLIFF PALMBERG

Laser-light exhibition wows Bramlage crowd

TODD PACEY
Kansas State Collegian

Two thousand people gathered in the west end of Bramlage Coliseum on Friday night to see Dorothy meet Pink Floyd.

The audience was there to see the sold-out "Dark Side of the Rainbow." Many had purchased 3-D glasses to enhance the effects of the laser show. The glasses weren't necessary to see the show, but they added to the enjoyment.

"I want you to put on your glasses. They might remind you of something that you did in, maybe, the parking lot," J.B. Morrison from KMKF-FM 101.5 said as he announced the beginning of the show.

The first half of the show featured the music of "Dark Side of the Moon" set to the classic movie "The Wizard of Oz." Recently, many Pink Floyd fans, along with numerous World Wide Web sites had been talking about the coincidences that can be seen during this juxtaposition.

"There were some things that went right along with the movie, such as the tempo of the music changing along with the action in the movie. The best example was probably the beginning of 'Money,'" B.J. Haraughty, sophomore in park resource management, said.

As the door to Dorothy's house opened when she arrived at Oz, the cash register sounds in "Money" began. At this moment the movie turned to color, just like the phrase "the color of money." Fans cheered at this and other coincidences.

The second half of the show featured various Pink Floyd hits along with scenes from the movie "The Wall." These songs included "Comfortably Numb," "Brick in the Wall" and "Goodbye Cruel World."

"At the end of 'Goodbye Cruel World' there was a gun made by the lasers and as he said goodbye for the last time, there was an explosion as the gun fired. It was very loud, and everybody jumped," Brian David, senior in agronomy, said.

"We were very pleased with the show. It was much better than the one that we had earlier in 1991. The attendance was great. If we had known that there was going to be such a big turnout we could have rearranged, but we didn't want people to have to sit too far away from the screen," Jim Muller, associate director of Bramlage, said.

As the fans exited Bramlage, they expressed similar emotions by delivering their exclamation of choice. Some even announced it was the best thing they had ever seen.

"Most shows are staying in the metropolitan areas, so we are pleased when an event such as this comes along. However we don't want to be repetitive. We really like this show, but we will probably wait a few years before we have it again," Charlie Thomas, director of Bramlage, said.

If you missed the show, you can try "Dark Side of the Rainbow" at home. Start "The Dark Side of the Moon" at the third roar of the MGM lion at the beginning of "The Wizard of Oz." However, as those in attendance will tell you, it was the lasers and the sound system that made the show "awesome."

Upcoming BirdHouse performances offer variety of styles

JOHN FRANSON
Kansas State Collegian

Saturday's bluegrass performance of Usual Suspects illustrates that the BirdHouse concert series is not just a forum for folk music.

"We have great instrumental musicians come through," said David Kamerer, BirdHouse founder and assistant professor of journalism and mass communications. "We've done a little bit of Celtic, and that's very popular, and bluegrass fits into that mix nicely. We did one blues show, it was very successful. So we program the best artists that we can get, regardless of what they do."

Singer, songwriter and guitarist Celeste Krenz will perform at BirdHouse on Feb. 21. She has two albums of contemporary country-folk and an album of covers of old country standards. She opened for Judy Collins and has been featured at all the big festivals.

"She has a beautiful voice," Kamerer said. "She veers a little bit toward country, but still, a very strong songwriter."

Best known as the voice behind Chevrolet's "Heart of America" commercials, Cliff Eberhardt performs March 21. He also sang with Richie Havens and is sometimes called the bad boy of the acoustic circuit.

"He has kind of just this sneer, and a lot of his songs show a lot of that New York attitude, but he also writes very tender love songs," Kamerer said.

BirdHouse will also celebrate its third birthday March 21. Plans include compact disc giveaways and birthday cake for the audience.

Dee Carstensen, winner of the 1996 troubadour award for best new songwriter at the Rocky Mountain Folks Festival, will perform on April 4. She plays concert harp and keyboards with a guitarist and percussionist.

"I really believe that she is going to break out and be very successful very soon," said Kamerer. "It just boggles my mind that we're able to get her here."

The former lead guitarist for Wings, Laurence Juber, will perform on May 16. His music has also been on "Roseanne,"

Acoustic series still searching for larger crowds to complement regulars at BirdHouse concerts

JOHN FRANSON
Kansas State Collegian

It was apparent Saturday night that many in attendance at the first BirdHouse concert of the season were regulars.

Scattered applause and cheers broke out when David Kamerer walked on stage at the Manhattan Center for the Arts. Kamerer isn't a performer. He's one of the main people involved in making BirdHouse — Manhattan's only showcase of acoustic music — a reality. He's a familiar face to the people who come to the shows.

"We have about 40 people that come very, very regularly, and there's a larger group that comes some, or often, and our big challenge is expanding that core audience," Kamerer, who is also an assistant professor of journalism and mass communications, said.

One group BirdHouse has been trying to reach from the start is students. "We have a discount ticket price for students. We have been pretty good at getting coverage on campus, but we just haven't been good at getting students to come. And that's a problem," Kamerer said.

He said the reason for lack of student attendance might be a misconception about the kind of music being played.

"Folk has bad connotations — there's so much bad folk music out there. You think of really whiny guitar players singing 'Kum Ba Yah,' and that's not what you get here at all," he said.

Kamerer said BirdHouse prefers the word "acoustic" to "folk."

"What we program mostly are really good songwriters, and a lot of our songwriters do sell their songs to major rock and pop artists, and country," he said. "It's music where you can and want to hear the words."

The first performer Saturday was Anne Hills, a singer-songwriter from Pennsylvania. She said after the show people might have the wrong idea about the kind of music BirdHouse offers.

"I think that people have a sort of limited idea of what folk music is. Maybe because it isn't played as much on radio, so they don't have really a concept of what it is. They think it's something that was from the early '60s," she said.

Aaron Fisher, junior in radio and television, has worked sound for several of the shows, and he said he has enjoyed the performances.

"I've heard a lot of stuff that I didn't think I'd be into, and then whenever I heard it, it was pretty cool," he said.

Usual Suspects, an area bluegrass and folk band, performed after Hills.

Band members include former state mandolin champion Scott Tichenor, former state fiddle champion and K-State Associate Professor of History Peter Knupfer and vocalist and guitarist Chris Biggs, who is a Geary County prosecutor.

"I'm not normally a bluegrass fan, but it put a big goofy smile on my face," Fisher said about Usual Suspects.

Erin Carter, sophomore in history, also enjoyed the performances, especially Usual Suspects. It was her first BirdHouse concert.

"It's a lot like theater — it's better when it's a live performance than when you hear it on the radio," she said. "It had so much energy. I had an urge to stand up and try to dance."

Manhattan resident Jimmy Carter, who owns Westwin recording studio, came to help his engineer and left saying it was the best music he'd heard in a long time.

"It was phenomenal," he said. "I never knew where the BirdHouse was until tonight, and I wanted to check it out, so I'll definitely come a lot more."

Carter said people need to open up to different types of music. "You listen to sometimes the same songs over and over, and it's the same style, and I think you need to get out and listen to others and appreciate it."

Engineering fair helps children, K-Staters have fun with science

WYNN DALTON
Kansas State Collegian

K-State students were the force behind the success of the City of Manhattan Science and Engineering Fair this weekend at Manhattan Town Center.

A K-State student organization sponsors the fair every year. Event organizers said the connection with K-State is essential for the fair to utilize facilities on campus, to encourage other students to become involved and to lend to the success of the event.

Alpha Phi Omega, a national co-ed service fraternity, organized this year's event, which showcased 87 exhibits from Manhattan students.

COMSEF Director Darren Strauss said sponsoring the fair is another way for Alpha Phi Omega to help the community and fulfill their cardinal rules — leadership, service and friendship.

"I enjoy seeing kids do these kinds of projects. It's something I wish would have happened when I was a student here in Manhattan," Strauss said. "I think this helps out the students a lot down the road and with their school."

Awards Assembly Chair Kelly Arvin, junior in advertising, said helping with the fair provides Manhattan students role models.

"I remember when I was in the third grade, and I had to do the science fair," Arvin said. "I know how much it meant to me when I had someone that I could look up to like my mom and dad."

COMSEF started four years ago when two K-State students from Manhattan wanted a way to promote science. Jennifer Searfoss, one of the co-founders, said students' excitement about their projects makes the event worthwhile.

"For me it's the kids, their smiling faces and the moment they see that award. They are so happy," she said. "Last year one of the classes actually skipped their recess to work on their projects. I think that's so amazing — kids wanting to be nerdy."

Searfoss said she has enjoyed seeing the fair become a success.

"This was just an idea in my head. To see it actually here is probably the most singly proud thing I have," she said.

Since its beginning, COMSEF has been hosted by K-State students. No faculty members or adults have organized the event, and Arvin said that's something all K-State students can be proud of.

Lecture to feature right-to-die issue

JENNIFER LUCKE
Kansas State Collegian

Tonight's Lou Douglas Lecture features Dr. Timothy Quill, an advocate of physician-assisted suicide.

The lecture will be at 7:30 tonight in McCain Auditorium.

Beverly Earles-Law, coordinator, said Quill will speak about patient-physician relationships and making decisions. She also said the forum in the afternoon will be more case-based.

"I hope to have an audience prepared to ask difficult questions," Earles-Law said.

QUILL

Quill presented the first right-to-die case, Vacco vs. Quill, in front of the Supreme Court in early 1997. The case was reviewed in conjunction with another physician-assisted suicide case, Washington vs. Glucksberg.

Time magazine reported that Quill argued that the 14th Amendment gave mentally competent adults the right to make decisions about the end of their lives. He argued that the equal protection clause that gave terminally ill patients the right to end life support gives a patient not hooked to a machine equal rights.

According to the home page of the office of New York Attorney General Dennis C. Vacco, the Supreme Court ruled in favor of Vacco, saying terminally ill people do not have the right to physician-assisted suicide.

Earles-Law said Quill was one of the first doctors to confess to helping a patient die. In 1991, he admitted he prescribed enough pills for a terminally ill patient to die.

Quill is considered a respectable doctor connected with the right-to-die issue, Earles-Law said. He does not have the controversial reputation of his colleague, Jack Kevorkian.

Quill will be using 35-millimeter slides and a video during his presentation.

The lecture is co-sponsored by the Dorothy Thompson Civil Rights Lectures and the University Distinguished Lecturers Series.

More info?
Quill will speak at a forum for students today at 3:30 p.m. in the Union Big 12 Room.

MY FAVORITE WORKOUT

Gene Warren can be found any day of the work week swimming laps at the Natatorium during his lunch hour. The gentle swoosh of the water makes his workouts appear effortless. The impressive fact is that Warren swims 3,000 yards each day, accumulating over 8.5 miles every week. He supplements his swimming routine with walking a 4-mile route 5 days a week. Having graduated from KSU in 1976 with a physical education degree, Warren has always been active. But he didn't begin swimming seriously until after swimming 600 yards in a university sponsored triathlon competition in 1991. Warren has been swimming ever since and credits his workouts for maintaining a good weight and healthy lifestyle. He states, "Exercise is beneficial for everyone! The hardest part of the workout is the first stroke! Just get out the door and do it!" Warren is an insurance agent for State Farm insurance here in Manhattan.

Healthy Meals - Keep warm and healthy during the cold winter months. Try a new recipe for low-fat soup, stew or chili. Short on time but high on health? Microwave a savory low-fat frozen entree and round out the meal with a salad, roll, nonfat milk, and fresh fruit for dessert.

Fitness Facts

Muscle weighs more than fat. Don't be discouraged if you gain weight while working out. A low-fat diet ensures the added weight is lean body mass (muscle weight) rather than fat.

Who's Who

Deanna French came to KSU from Rosemount, MN by way of Drake University Des Moines, IA. French has worked as both weight/fitness room supervisor and fitness consultant for Recreational Services over the past 3 years. Her interest and training in wellness, nutrition and use of exercise to help people improve themselves has served her well in this capacity. French said, "I love the atmosphere at the Rec, the people I meet on a daily basis, and the many opportunities I have had to help make someone's day go better." French follows her own advice to others by exercising six days a week using a combination of free weights and cardiovascular machines. She will graduate in May and plans to complete an internship in Florida and earn her certification as a registered dietitian.

John Wondra, native of Claflin, KS, began his affiliation with Recreational Services in spring semester 1995 when he signed on as an intramural basketball official. He has been working in the intramural sports arena ever since - first as an official and then as an intramural supervisor and is completing an internship in intramural sports for Recreational Services this semester. He loves to officiate all sports and has worked numerous games at schools throughout the area. Wondra will graduate in May with a life science degree and plans to pursue a masters in sports administration. Wondra looks forward to continuing his involvement in what he enjoys most. And that is sports!

Darin Nadler, from Kansas City, KS, has been employed as Recreational Services' computer system/network administrator for the past 2-1/2 years and is responsible for providing technical expertise in installation and maintenance of hardware, software and computer communications for the department. He also designed and created Rec Services' home page and maintains its web site. Nadler said, "The opportunities I have gained from Rec Services and the experience I have gained will prove invaluable to my future employment. I am sure the things I have learned about computers and networking will open many doors for me!" Nadler graduates in May with a degree in television production and plans to pursue a career in live television news or video production.

K-State student hit on highway by truck, dies at scene

LINDSEY FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

K-State parks and recreation management student Gregory Allen Arpin, 22, was killed early Sunday morning.

At 2:25 a.m., Arpin was walking along U.S. Highway 50 in Edwards County when he was struck by a 1993 Freightliner semi pulling a 1996 Walk trailer.

He was pronounced dead at the scene and later transported to the Central Kansas Medical Center in Great Bend.

Kan.

The semi's driver, Ryan Wettstein, 26, of Liberal, Kan., and one passenger, Cletus Ricke, 44, of Dodge City, Kan., were not injured.

The semi was traveling westbound on U.S. 50 when Arpin, walking on the north shoulder, ran directly toward the semi waving his arms, said Mark Crump, Kansas Highway Patrol officer. Crump said alcohol could have affected his judgment.

The semi could not avoid hitting Arpin, a Kansas Highway Patrol representative said. Arpin came to rest in the eastbound lane.

Arpin attended a bachelor party over the weekend at an abandoned school in the town of Offerle.

Arpin and others left their cars in Kinsley, eight miles away, to avoid drinking and driving. There was supposedly a chaperone to pick the guests up after the party, Crump said.

According to people at the party whom Crump talked to, Arpin was intoxicated and left the party upset, although not suicidal.

"You can't explain what was going through his head," Crump said. "Nobody can."

Arpin, a graduate of Buhler High School, transferred from Hutchinson Community College to K-State in fall 1996.

He was a senior at K-State studying wildlife management. "Academically, he was a good student," said Mark Morgan, assistant professor of park and resource management and Arpin's adviser. "He got along well with students and faculty."

Morgan said Arpin was recently offered an assistant management position at a sporting goods store in Hutchinson, but declined the offer to stay in school.

"The unique thing about Greg is that he liked to hunt and fish," Morgan said. "He always told good hunting-type stories in class."

The funeral will be at 10 a.m.

Wednesday at the Holy Cross Church in Hutchinson.

Greg Arpin is survived by his parents, Jerry Arpin and Carolyn Arpin, of Hutchinson, and an older brother, Jeff Arpin, 24, of Topeka.

"Students can get help for grief or any other problems that may be related to this," said Carla Jones, associate dean of student life.

Students are encouraged to call the University Counseling Service or the Office of Student Life.

Students may fund part of library plan

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
Kansas State Collegian

A $328,000 student privilege fee would be students' equal share of the financial burden to solve shortages at Hale Library, Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock told Privilege Fee Committee members Monday.

In his meeting with the committee and a morning meeting with administrators, Hobrock said students' contributions are essential to the "three-legged stool" plan that is hoped to solve funding shortages at the library.

State funding and KSU Foundation money — already virtually guaranteed by administrators and Foundation officials — are the plan's other two legs.

Hobrock said a student fee would be roughly equal to the other two revenue sources.

"We're proposing sharing the pain," he said. "If we could get the money anywhere else, we would."

With budget increases by the Kansas Legislature in the Other Operating Expenses fund, which serves as the university's general fund account, Hobrock said the library could maintain 5,000 journal subscriptions. But Foundation and student money will prompt noticeable improvements and increases in the amount of periodical subscriptions, electronic services and book purchases.

"It's the Foundation and student money that's really going to make a difference. You're going to see more damn books on those shelves than we've had in years," Hobrock said.

Committee members asked how undergraduates are affected by periodical shortages because they would contribute the majority of money for a student fee. Though journals are used more by graduate students and faculty, Hobrock said other shortages affect undergraduates and necessitate a fee.

"This is far from just a graduate student and faculty issue. It affects every undergraduate," he said.

When questioned about a user fee, Hobrock said the pay-to-use strategy shouldn't be used to fight a shortage that affects every student.

"There are kids who will plop in their SmartCards and not care what they pay to print out a full-text article. They have the big balances," Hobrock said. "But you have other kids who are here on a shoestring. User fees are a very poor strategy to operate a library on."

Hobrock said he knows a student privilege fee would require results.

"You need to have a direct result from any student funds given to this issue," he said. "I've got to give you a product that will make you a successful library user and not the loser that we now make you because of a lack of printed materials."

New endowment pays for Foundation's share

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

The KSU Foundation announced Monday a complex support scheme that could provide an estimated $300,000 a year for acquisitions support for Hale Library.

Gary Hellebust, president and CEO of the Foundation, said the support will come from new endowment money — a previously untapped resource.

The plan was revealed at a Monday meeting with Hellebust, President Jon Wefald, Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock and Provost Jim Coffman.

The plan would use money generated from new endowments.

Hellebust said based on a projection of nearly $6 million in new endowments this year, the 4.75-percent return to the library could generate between $300,000 and $500,000. If the returns would be higher than 12 percent, Hellebust said the extra money could be put into a long-term endowment for the library.

"We were not able to address the $10 million endowment," Hellebust said.

The Task Force to Plan for Financing the Library of the 21st Century's October report had identified the Foundation as the potential source for a $10 million endowment. The task force also identified two other sources, the state and students. Last week, Wefald said it was likely K-State will receive a 2.5-percent increase in Other Operating Expenses, 1 percent of which would go to the library. That would amount to roughly $328,000.

Coffman said the $328,000 would cover the cost of inflation on the more than 5,000 journal subscriptions at Hale.

"If we can establish a precedent with the OOE with the Legislature and have an incremental increase of 1 percent in

Physician advocates assisted suicide as last resort

JENNIFER LUKE
Kansas State Collegian

Dr. Timothy E. Quill, noted advocate of physician-assisted suicide, spoke Monday about the importance of the doctor-patient relationship in helping a terminally ill patient through death.

The lecture was co-sponsored by the Lou Douglas Lecture Series, the University Distinguished Lecture Series and the Dorothy Thompson Civil Rights Lectures.

Quill said he supports helping a patient make decisions, comparing it to being a midwife through death. He said the term midwife captured what people were looking for in the last stage of life.

"Assisted dying, in any form, is a last resort," Quill said.

Quill said he advocates hospice care, in which a good doctor-patient relationship is key. He said numerous qualities make hospice care better than hospital care.

There is a greater emphasis on the relief of suffering, a higher priority placed on the individual, a patient is given choices, there is more aggressive treatment of symptoms and patients aren't abandoned, Quill said. He said hospice care should be standard for all dying patients.

Most terminally ill patients do not receive the type of care they need. Doctors should be better educated in care of the dying, Quill said. He pointed out that most doctors are licensed with little or no background in pain management.

"Helping people die is a legitimate part of medicine," Quill said.

Quill was one of the first doctors to admit he had prescribed enough medication to help a patient die. During the speech, Quill presented a video interview with one such patient, named Cynthia.

Cynthia was a graduate student in her mid-30s when she was diagnosed with gastric cancer, a disease with no known successful treatment.

She became Quill's patient and elected to go through an unlikely experimental treatment to fight the disease, even though it meant spending the end of her life in a round of tests and surgeries. Cynthia also decided she didn't want to die in pain.

"I don't want to die resisting. I want to be at peace," Cynthia said on the video.

When the surgeries failed, Quill prescribed an increase in pain killers. Cynthia died quietly a few days later.

Quill counseled Cynthia through her death.

In the video, Cynthia said she knew she was more than just a disease to Quill, and she knew he wouldn't abandon her, even if the surgeries failed.

Terminally ill ovarian cancer patient struggles with daily life

ASSOCIATED PRESS

PLEASANT HILL, Ore. — For Penny Schlueter, every day is a struggle.

Pain from ovarian cancer shoots through her body in dull waves. Her strength is sapped by repeated rounds of surgery and chemotherapy. Most days are spent curled up on the couch, shivering, even under piles of blankets.

Sitting hurts too much. Picking up the phone leaves her exhausted. Her hair, which has fallen out and grown back several times, has returned to frame her drawn features in salt-and-pepper shades that make her appear much older than her 56 years.

"My doctor thinks I have a year to live, but I feel like I'm going downhill faster than that," the retired college economics teacher said, drawing up a blanket around her.

Schlueter and others in Oregon facing the prospect of an agonizing death are waiting to take advantage of the nation's only law that lets doctors help them take their own lives. But a legal hurdle remains.

While Oregon voters passed an assisted suicide law in 1994 — and then reaffirmed it last November — doctors have been holding back for fear of losing their federal licenses to prescribe narcotic painkillers and other drugs.

A U.S. Justice Department team reviewing Oregon's law recently concluded that federal drug officers cannot punish doctors who write prescriptions for life-ending drugs for patients. A final decision still has to be made by Attorney General Janet Reno.

Schlueter isn't ready to let go yet, but said even when that time comes she won't ask her doctor to help her commit suicide if legal questions remain.

Schlueter predicts she will die from a lethal dose of barbiturates prescribed by her doctor.

"I'll probably take the pills at the point where there is no real life left, but no death either," she said.

K-State to compete against KU in blood drive; donor registration to begin today in Union

The American Red Cross is urging individuals who meet donor eligibility requirements to donate at the American Red Cross blood drive, because Kansas is experiencing an outbreak of sickness because of a shortage in the available blood supply across the state.

Eligible donors must be at least 17 years old, weigh 110 pounds and be in good health. Donors who are taking antibiotics must be off the medication for two days and must be feeling well before they can donate.

K-State will compete against the University of Kansas for bragging rights to the blood-drive challenge trophy. In the October blood drive, K-State defeated KU by collecting 879 units of blood as opposed to 665 units. This time around, the goal for the five-day K-State blood drive is 750 units.

"It is important for KSU students to keep the blood supply at high levels," said Mark Barkman, student coordinator for the campus blood drive. "There is no synthetic product to replace blood. The blood donated at this site is kept in Kansas."

Registration for the blood drive will take place in the K-State Student Union from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m., and at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex from 6 to 9 tonight and Wednesday. Appointments can also be made by stopping at the registration desk during the blood drive.

Regents search for replacement of WSU president, hope to find successor by beginning of January

TOPEKA — The Kansas Board of Regents members are putting their search for a new president for Wichita State University on a fast track and hope to have the successor to retiring President Eugene Hughes in place by next Jan. 1.

Stephen Jordan, the regents' executive director, told the Senate Education Committee on Monday the board has set a timetable for selecting its final five candidates by Sept. 1, interviewing them during its regular September meeting and choosing the new Wichita State president by Oct. 1.

They would want the new president to take office by the first of next year, Jordan said.

NATIONAL NEWS

Clinton sends Congress balanced budget proposal that could mark nation's 1st surplus in 3 decades

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton, declaring an end to "an era of exploding deficits," Monday sent Congress a $1.73 trillion budget proposal that promises a history-making achievement — the first surplus in three decades.

But Republicans, who control Congress, were not impressed by Clinton's anticipated $9.5 billion surplus, accusing the president of returning to old-fashioned Democratic tax-and-spend policies.

"This is a budget only a liberal could love," said House Speaker Newt Gingrich, R-Ga. "This is a far cry from the leaner, more flexible government that the president promised."

Clinton unveiled his budget at a White House ceremony, saying, "This budget marks the end of an era, an end to decades of deficits that have shackled our economy, paralyzed our politics and held our people back." Clinton said in a budget ceremony in the East Room of the White House.

To underscore his achievement, Clinton drew a gigantic zero on a chart labeled 1999 budget deficit, drawing applause from the crowd of administration officials and congressional Democrats.

The president's prescription of more spending would be paid for in part by $105.6 billion in tax increases and user fees, chiefly on tobacco, corporations and investors over five years.

At the same time, his budget calls for $24.2 billion in tax cuts, including child-care tax credits for working families.

It would provide one-third more in resources for education and job training in 1999 and proposes $21.3 billion over five years for new child care initiatives. The budget would double to 2 million the number of youngsters getting federal child-care subsidies, boost spending on the Head Start preschool program and provide more support for businesses and states running child care programs.

Dow Jones average jumps more than 200 points following sharp gains in stock markets abroad

NEW YORK — The Dow Jones industrial average shot up more than 200 points Monday, leaping well above 8,000, following sharp gains in stock markets abroad and on a jump in shares of drug companies.

The Dow rose as much as 200.54 to reach 8,107.04 at mid-afternoon. It then gave a little ground and was up 193.31, or 2.4 percent, at 8,099.81 as the trading day wound down.

The last time it closed at more than 8,000 was on Dec. 9, when the average of 30 blue-chip stocks finished at 8,049.66. Its record close of 8,259.31 was set Aug. 6.

Texas refuses clemency for convicted murderer; Pickax killer takes another step toward execution

AUSTIN, Texas — The Texas Board of Pardons and Paroles Monday refused to recommend clemency for Karla Faye Tucker, moving the condemned pickax killer a step closer to execution tonight.

The board's decision was not unexpected. The 18-member panel unanimously rejected 16 similar requests from condemned men last year when a record 37 convicted killers were put to death in the state. Monday's vote was 16-0, with two board members abstaining.

Tucker, sentenced to die for her part in an attack that left two people dead in 1983, needed at least 10 votes in favor of clemency to send the case to Gov. George W. Bush. Bush then could have agreed with the panel he appoints or reject its recommendation.

The board's rejection means Bush only can issue a 30-day reprieve. Tucker, whose case has drawn international attention, also has an appeal pending before the U.S. Supreme Court.

Committee looks into fee proposal

JESSI BRUNSON
Kansas State Collegian

Student fees could increase by about 70 cents next year if the Course Information Program proposal passes Student Senate.

The proposal was presented by CIP Committee Chair Chris Hansen at Monday's Privilege Fee Committee meeting. The committee approved a $14,810 fee increase to fund the program.

The proposal must still be passed by Student Senate.

The fee increase would be added to the Office of Student Activities and Services fee, but designated to go specifically to CIP.

Included in the $14,810 increase is money for a graduate assistant to supervise the program.

Hansen said funds would also pay for student workers and advertising.

Support for the program wouldn't just come from a student fee.

The provost and Office of Educational Advancement have given the program a seal of approval, Hansen said.

These offices would designate one-eighth of a full-time faculty position to supervise the program, representing a $10,000 contribution.

If approved, the CIP Committee would survey students in general education courses, publishing the results to help students make enrollment decisions.

The first real survey would be administered this fall with the results published in spring 1999.

Based on fall 1997 enrollment, Hansen said about 23,000 surveys will be handed out. In the first year, lower-level general education courses would be surveyed, covering about 18,400 students.

In the next year, Hansen said he hopes to expand to include upper-level general education courses in the 300-599 range, reaching another 4,600 students.

Hansen was positive about the CIP's possible expansion in the future.

"This really allows ourselves to evolve to other needs," he said. "The momentum will be there in a couple of years. I think we'll have to grow into that."

Hansen said despite future expansion of CIP, the budget most likely would not change because the cost of adding courses to the survey would not be noticeable.

Privilege Fee Committee Vice Chair Aaron Truax said he was concerned the program wouldn't benefit graduate and veterinary medicine students, but they would still pay a privilege fee.

Because graduate-level classes have such low numbers enrolled, usually only one section is available. Truax said CIP information would be beneficial to only a small number of students and would not be deemed necessary to the whole student body.

"I don't see much application for the Graduate School, transfer students and vet med," he said. "Vet med has a very rigid curriculum, and this would not be beneficial."

Committee members discussed making veterinary medicine students exempt from the fee, but weren't sure if such a designation was possible.

Privilege Fee Committee Chair Aaron Otto said members should wait to see if there was precedent to exclude some students from the fee.

Privilege Fee Committee member Brandon Konda said as a transfer student, he wouldn't have benefited from the program.

Konda said most of his classes were upper-level and probably wouldn't be included in those surveyed.

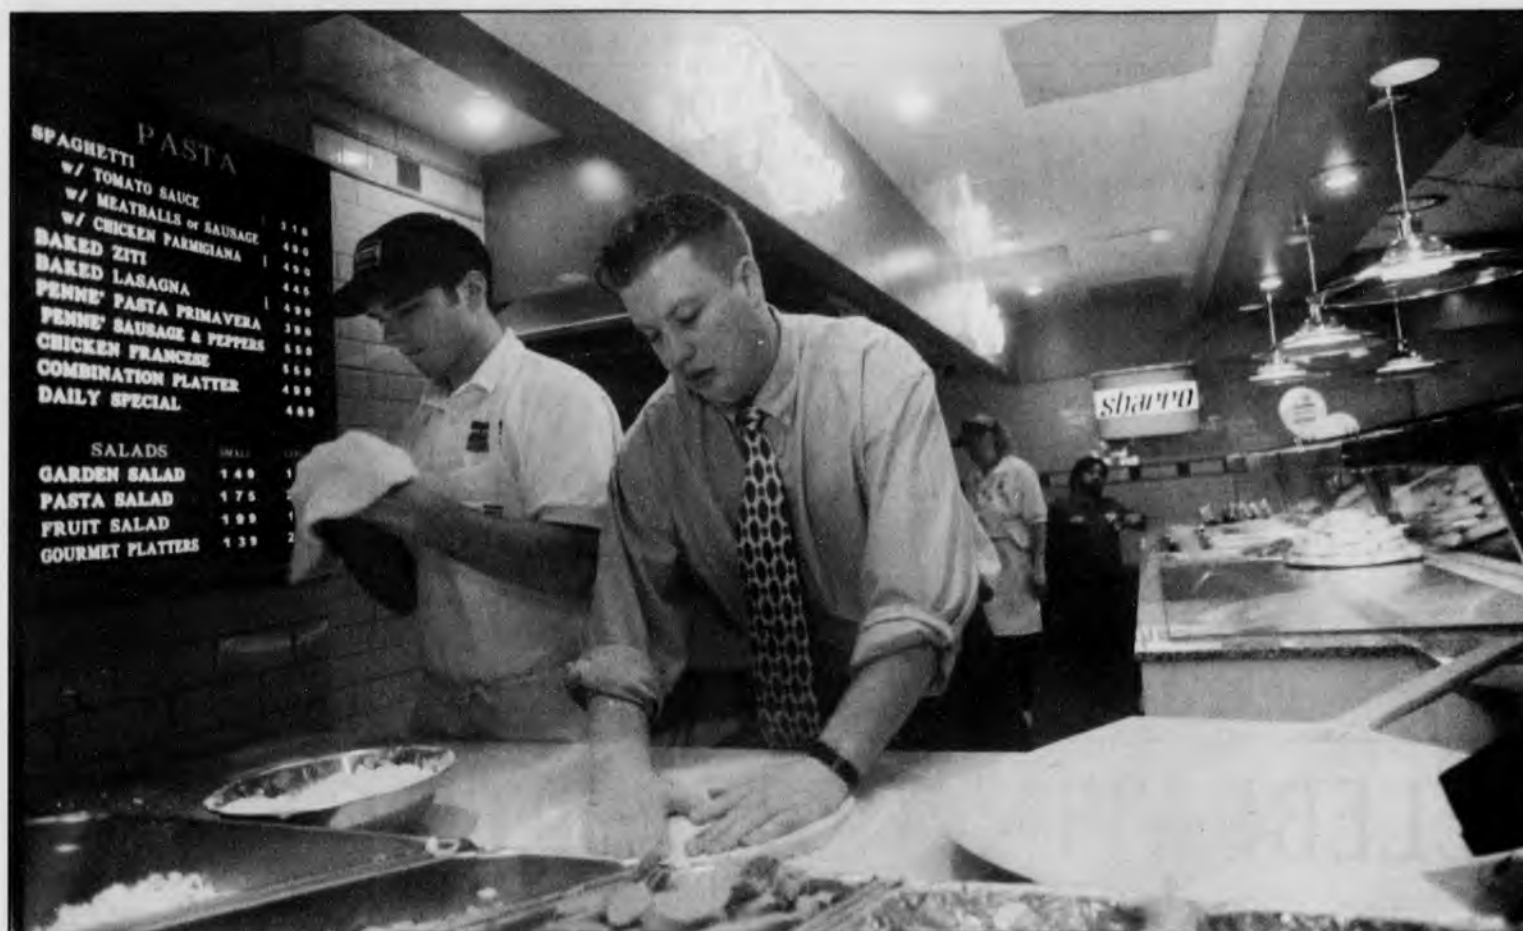

Despite those concerns, the committee voted to send the OSAS fee bill to Senate for first readings with the CIP increase.

Committee members will discuss the legislation again during their Feb. 9 meeting.

"THIS REALLY ALLOWS OURSELVES TO EVOLVE TO OTHER NEEDS. THE MOMENTUM WILL BE THERE IN A COUPLE OF YEARS. I THINK WE'LL HAVE TO GROW INTO THAT."

Telefund shoots for $1 million goal

STUDENTS CALL ALUMNI TO SOLICIT DONATIONS.

KELLY REDDING
Kansas State Collegian

Nearly 1,400 students will make calls for the 19th-annual KSU Foundation Telefund.

Telefund has become a tradition at K-State.

Every year, students donate their time to call alumni and ask for donations to the college from which they graduated.

Gordon Dowell, director of annual giving at the Foundation, said one of the main reasons for the Telefund's success is the students.

"The enthusiasm of the students is incredible," he said. "We have 1,400 callers and 20 nights to make the calls in. And, as far as we know, this is the world's largest all-volunteer telephone campaign for higher education."

When Telefund began in 1980, the Foundation had to rent out a room on the second floor of the K-State Student Union.

Each night, the volunteers had to set up and take down the 15 to 20 phones they used. Telefund made $135,516 its first year.

In 1990, the Foundation moved into the former Farm Bureau building and established the Hollis Telefund Center. The Telefund Center holds 82 telephones that have been upgraded with headsets for easier use.

Last year's Telefund raised $890,324, the highest mark ever. This year's goal is even higher at $1 million. The money raised through Telefund goes to provide scholarships and enhancements for the colleges.

The students who participate in Telefund are rewarded with prizes donated from the surrounding business community. This year nearly $40,000 in prizes was donated. Grand prizes include two $700 mountain bikes, weekend packages to Kansas City and scholarship money.

Khris House, senior in architectural engineering and pre-law, has been volunteering for four years.

"I think it's fun," he said. "My dad told me that I could talk just about anyone into just about anything."

Sara Kibbe, junior in industrial engineering, is a first-year volunteer. She said she wanted to make the phone calls because she is a scholarship winner.

"I got a scholarship, and I think that it's important to do something in return for the school," Kibbe said.

K-State ranks second in the Big 12 and sixth nationally in terms of alumni support.

Black History Month provides education for all

Attending one of the 20 events celebrating Black History Month in February not only promotes a greater awareness of another culture but also serves as an important educational opportunity.

The students, staff and faculty who organized the 1998 Black History Month calendar deserve recognition for assembling relevant speakers, bringing up important topics for discussion and confronting controversial issues.

The call for students of all cultural and racial backgrounds to participate in these events should not be ignored.

The events of this month allow students to consider another point of view and to round out their opinions and knowledge of the world.

Speakers and topics, in discussing black history, fill in a too-often overlooked portion of our American history.

The innovations and contributions of black men and women need to be discussed, acknowledged and celebrated.

Unfortunately, we don't always have the opportunity to study this in our classrooms. Months such as this one highlight information and individuals whose contributions cannot be overlooked.

If nothing else, open your mind. This is an opportunity to educate yourself and learn from other perspectives.

In attending a McCain performance, a panel discussion or a speaker, students can put a face on the issues, hear the stories of real Americans and increase their understanding of where they came from. These stories and these people give the month a greater meaning.

This is where we begin to understand another dimension of who we are and how this country came about.

Students should make time to attend Black History Month events and learn from and celebrate a part of our American history.

CELEBRATING DIFFERENCE race should never be an obstacle

I didn't remember until a few days ago that February is Black History Month. Not because I'm not proud to be a minority, but because my life is so hectic right now. Once I remembered, I started reflecting on my experiences as a minority, positive and negative.

Every so often, people remind me, "They don't come right out and say, 'Oh my God, you're black!'" Instead, their actions do it for them. This approach is much worse. But it's the same as it's always been, the sales clerks who don't acknowledge me in the trendy stores or prospective employers on the phone who act surprised when they see my face. These aren't people hiding behind racism. They're just plain stupid.

It's true that I don't play the race card for sympathy. I believe all people are inherently responsible for their own actions. In many situations, personality conflicts, not race, are to blame for failed friendships and relationships. Without question, though, there are times when stereotypes and myths get the best (or worst) of otherwise normal, clear-minded people.

For many years I was the only minority in my schools and in my neighborhoods. Obviously, everyone knew my name. Because my parents and grandparents raised me to look beyond the color of one's skin, I was friends with all kinds of people. Not until junior high did normal peer pressure turn into racial pressure, with the two sides asking me to make a choice.

At 13 years of age I lived in Naples Island, Calif., an exclusive suburb of Long Beach. I had my own room, the latest clothes and way too much freedom. I was lucky enough to participate in an educational program for gifted students. I didn't have problems making friends with the others, most of whom were white.

The fact that I was black wasn't an issue. We didn't sit around talking about how much smarter or how much better we were than those not in the program. For the first half of the day, we were bused to the inner city. How ironic that the city-wide program for gifted students was housed in a decaying institution, in the high-crime area of town, where you needed an ID card to get past security. At noon we took the bus back to our regular high school, the Beverly Hills 90210 of Long Beach.

There was so much friction between my white classmates in the gifted program and my black friends at my regular high school—who themselves were bused in—I wasn't sure where I fit in. My black friends thought I "acted" or "spoke" or "wanted to be" white. My white friends weren't crazy about my black friends because they skipped school, did drugs and fought.

My black friends should have realized that what they saw in me was progress. My white friends should have known that drugs, truancy and fighting weren't racially exclusive to blacks. It was quite a predicament for me, trying to remain a sane teenager within these two different entities. My solution was to maintain two separate identities. Doing so allowed me to remain friends with everyone.

Years later I returned to the Midwest—not only older, but more aware in high school that the great racial divide still existed. The school I attended had upper and lower glass hallway meeting points where kids hung out before school.

One level was for black students, the other for white students. Of course, there were no posted signs to this effect. It just happened that way. Since I was going to school with white classmates I'd known for years through my grandparents, which hallway could I survive in? Whichever one I chose, the other had friends in it that would have felt slighted. My solution was to stay out of both. By not feeding the racial inequality set out for me, I again was able to keep my black friends and my white friends.

Adulthood has brought a sense of peace. Friendships even turned into relationships. I've had boyfriends of many races, even a few losers who wanted to go out as long as their friends weren't watching. They had a "chocolate fantasy."

Overall, though, I've openly and comfortably dated guys who shared my interests. I couldn't have cared less what color they were. I still don't. Love is only one color.

It's taken many years, but I've realized I don't have to make a choice. I can embrace and nurture my ethnic heritage without sacrificing the friendships of others. Although I'm not the spokesperson for my race, what I can explain about what it means to me to be black is just as important as what they can explain about themselves.

The stereotypes and myths about black people are out there and can't fully be addressed here. I'm not naive. I know there are people who want to keep others from achieving great things, based simply on the color of their skin. I would hope, though, that all people, no matter what color they are, be taken as individuals and that their strengths and weaknesses be evaluated in that context.

If they tend to be loud and obnoxious and use the English language incorrectly, chalk it up to the fact that they might not have been given the quality education some of us have been given. Don't blame it on their race.

Subsequently, if you feel you have not been given an equal opportunity to find or keep a job, look inside yourself. Maybe you lack certain fundamental skills, or you just don't have the personality for it. Don't automatically assume it's because someone's out to get you. To do so might further perpetuate those stereotypes and myths.

I've heard non-minorities question why we have a Black History Month, when we don't have a month for their particular culture. Or why there's not a National Association for the Advancement of (Their) People.

All I would ask is that it not be held against one race to have self-gratifying organizations of its own. The existence of these organizations, black or white, is not to keep out others, but to embrace their own.

Be reminded, though, that no matter what culture you belong to, no organization should advocate name-calling, violence or other negative acts. Doing so negates your organization's message. If anything, learn all about as many different cultures as you can. We know the world will end one day. If you remain so self-centered that you don't experience the good that others have to offer, your world could end much sooner.

I feel extremely lucky to have achieved so much in my lifetime. None of it would have been possible if I'd been so close-minded.

Misconceptions about evolution make theory difficult to understand

July 1925, A substitute teacher is put on trial for violating the Butler Law by allegedly teaching from a book that included information about the theory of evolution. From the first strike of the gavel, the debate between the theories of evolution and creationism has raged internationally. The one thing overlooked was debate itself.

In order to have a debate, you need two sides to the issue. Unfortunately, those who have argued the topic since the proposal of evolution 140 years ago don't seem to have considered the possibility that they were on the same side.

The issue is a deep-seated one, and thus stirs up emotions, causing people to refuse to listen to each other. Without hearing each other out, people who take sides fail to learn the details of the opposing argument.

Let's start at the beginning. According to the Bible, God created the earth in six days, and on the seventh he rested. Evolution requires millions of years to occur. So how could these two views coincide?

Simply put, time is relative. Individuals' perceptions of time are dependent on their frames of reference. For example, to a young child having to wait a year for Christmas to come again seems like an eternity.

Whereas to a grandparent, the years slip by as fast as the hours, and it can seem like every other weekend it's time to do the Christmas shopping. This is because a year represents a much larger fraction of their lifetime to children. Children's frames of reference, their lifetimes, are much shorter than their grandparents'.

As mentioned in the Bible, God has always existed and always will. Humans, by contrast, only live to an average age of about 80. So to a being countless trillions of years old, a few billion years could pass by as quickly as six days pass by to us.

Moving on to the origins of man—the general idea in the theory of evolution is that life began as single-celled organisms and slowly progressed to its current forms, including humans. In the Bible, God created a human from the dirt, the earth, or clay, depending on which printing of the Bible you read.

In biblical times, people were without the use of microscopes, and few people had dared to speculate the existence of living things that were essentially invisible. Though the field of medicine at the time was rather primitive, one thing was well-known. If you had any sort of open wound, and somehow got dirt in it, you could easily develop an infection. It wasn't known what had caused the infection, only that keeping a wound clean would drastically reduce the chance of a wound becoming infected. So it was presumed the dirt caused the infection. We now know very well the cause of the infection was not the dirt itself, but the microorganisms in the dirt.

How could the recorders of the Bible possibly have written of something that wouldn't be discovered for more than 1,000 years? They might have been shown the origins of humanity but had no way to describe it aside from what they knew it as, dirt.

One argument against this theory has been made that in the Bible, humans were created fairly instantaneously, not over millions of years. Once again, we go back to perception of time. In the eyes of God, humans might have developed rather rapidly, but his frame of reference is infinite, and therefore it could have easily been millions of years by our standards of time. Right in the middle of this topic comes the question often asked by creationists: If humans evolved from monkeys, why isn't that still happening?

This question in itself shows a lack of understanding of the theory of evolution. There are two large misconceptions in this question, first that we evolved from monkeys. No one has suggested that humans are closely related to monkeys. Our closest relatives are members of the ape family. The easiest distinction between apes and monkeys is that apes have no tails. Examples of apes include chimpanzees, orangutans and gorillas.

The other misconception is common and is the biggest misconception. The theory of evolution does not state that humans are descended from apes or chimpanzees. The theory is that humans share a common ancestor with apes. It is a small change in wording, but a monumental change in meaning.

A lot of people have trouble visualizing the difference in the two statements. The only analogy I could come up with to clear up the concept is not a perfect one.

All right, picture one of your cousins. You share a grandparent with this cousin. Therefore, you and your cousin, share a common ancestor. You are not descended from your cousin, and your cousin is not descended from you. By this analogy, one cousin is humanity, and the other is the chimpanzee. The common ancestor, a grandparent, lived long ago. At some point in time some of the individuals of the ancestral species left the forests and moved out onto the savanna. Over millions of years, the group that stayed in the forest developed into the chimpanzee, and the group that left developed into humanity.

There are many other points in the two theories that coincide. Unfortunately, there are people out there who aren't happy with just being told they're right. They are small-minded and get more pleasure from hearing their opposition admit to being wrong.

But, no one has to admit to being wrong here. If people open their minds to opposing points of view enough to learn the details, they might find they aren't so different that things have to get ugly.

READERSwrite

Reader doubts views on European freedom

Editor,
I am writing in response to Scott Hopper's Jan. 15 column, where he compared freedom in Europe to freedom in America. I am studying abroad at the University of Nice-Sophia Antipolis in France. I recently received the column in the mail, and there are several points with which I disagree.

To begin with, Hopper, your generalizations about Europe and Europeans are poorly founded. Europe is made up of many different countries, and many levels of liberalism and conservatism exist, in government and public opinion.

It seems you have selected qualities of individual countries and turned them into general European qualities. You cannot say there are no speed limits in Europe. I have yet to visit or hear of a road without speed limits, other than in Germany—where more limits are now being imposed. That is a rather gross generalization for an entire continent.

Similarly, it is hardly every country in Europe that regulates drugs and prostitution. In the vast majority of the countries, you are taking just as many risks doing drugs or frequenting prostitutes as you take in the United States. Again, be careful with such generalizations.

But outside of those statements, I have trouble with your explanations of why Europe is more free than America. For one, if you believe that American government is steeped in a need for control, live in France, where some might say Big Brother has found his home. I walk down the street in the middle of the day, minding my own business, and, if I am asked for my "papers," I can be taken to the police station if I don't happen to have photo ID on me. In France, all citizens carry national ID cards, the government makes sure you go for your regular medical exams, and you are almost incapable of leading a life untouched by the government's social initiatives. So much for the American notion of a right to privacy.

If you think lowering the legal drinking age encourages respect and responsible use of alcohol, you haven't spent much time in European college towns. College students are the same everywhere—I see just as much abuse of alcohol in the bars here as in the bars in Manhattan.

The only difference is it costs a whole lot more to drink here. Maybe raising the price of a Budweiser to $6 or $7 a bottle would keep the drinking in Aggieville to a minimum. It certainly has, this year, made me more reluctant to go for another round of beers. I think it is admirable, as you pointed out, that Germany has a smaller percentage of alcoholics than the United States. Again, though, I caution you against drawing that example to a generalization that "Europeans have learned to respect alcohol at an early age."

It is easy to find fault with American values and institutions, but you failed to mention any of the problems in Europe. For one, unemployment in much of Europe is problematic—the rate in France is 12.4 percent, more than twice the rate in the States. When I talk to my French classmates, they honestly have little or no hope of finding a steady job after finishing their degrees. Is that freedom?

I have spent the past five months adjusting to cultural differences between the role of women in America and the role of women where I live this year. I rarely can walk down the street, day or night, without having a man stare or make a sexual comment at me. (And I assure you, it has nothing to do with how I look or how I'm dressed. It's because I'm female and I'm breathing.) That makes me feel cheap and sometimes threatened. Is that freedom?

In short, you are correct—with a lower drinking age, the option to sunbathe in as little clothes as you like and an often more liberal view toward drug culture, Europe does have a lot of freedoms you don't find in the States. But Europe is too vast, and Europeans are too different from region to region, to be able to make many of the assertions you made.

Hopper, you say you want to be free to choose the path for your life. But I do challenge you to first decide what freedoms truly are the most important to you. Europe is a fantastic place. The opportunities to travel, to learn and to discover countries with rich history and culture are special. But when it comes to the idea of freedom, it is personally more important to me to be able to leave college with a decent chance of finding a job, to be able to pass a man on the street without feeling like I'm being evaluated and to be able to preserve a chosen degree of privacy in my life.

To me, those freedoms are far more important than being able to take off my bathing suit top when I go to the beach.

Wizards 113, Pistons 101

WASHINGTON D.C. — For the Detroit Pistons, life without Doug Collins is supposed to mean no more tension, no more friction. On Monday night, it meant no more defense.

On the day they fired the coach with the intense, confrontational style, the Pistons gave up their most points in a game this season in a 113-101 loss to the Washington Wizards.

Chris Webber had 23 points and 12 rebounds, and point guard Rod Strickland had 26 points, six rebounds and 10 assists as he took advantage of mismatches and blown defensive assignments throughout the game.

Jerry Stackhouse, benched as a starter by promoted assistant coach Alvin Gentry, led Detroit with 22 points in a reserve role as the Pistons lost for the fifth time in six games. They are ahead of only Toronto in the Central Division.

Heat 90, Hawks 83

MIAMI — Alonzo Mourning had 22 points and a season-high 17 rebounds for Miami, which played without forward P.J. Brown.

Brown sat out his one-game suspension for leaving the bench during a scuffle in Miami's 89-83 loss to the Knicks on Sunday.

It was Mourning's hard foul on New York's Larry Johnson that touched off that incident. On Monday night, Voshon Lenard knocked Atlanta center Dikembe Mutombo out of the game with a flagrant foul late in the fourth.

With 3:59 left and Miami up 85-77, Lenard fouled Mutombo as he was attempting a dunk. Mutombo, who landed hard on his back, walked off on his own but did not return.

Mookie Blaylock led the Hawks with 20 points. Mutombo had 14 points and 15 rebounds.

Cavaliers 109, Timberwolves 99

CLEVELAND — Rookie Cedric Henderson scored a season-high 24 points and rookie Zydrunas Ilgauskas had 19.

Henderson, one of four Cavs selected to play in this weekend's rookie game during NBA All-Star Weekend in New York, scored 10 first-quarter points on five-of-seven shooting.

Ilgauskas added 10 rebounds and All-Star forward Shawn Kemp had 16 points and 12 rebounds for the Cavs.

Stephon Marbury led Minnesota with 27 points on just 33 percent (seven-for-21) shooting.

Suns 106, 76ers 97

PHILADELPHIA — Rex Chapman scored 29 points as Phoenix won its third-straight road game.

Antonio McDyess had 22 points and 13 rebounds and Steve Nash added 17 points for the Suns, who are 4-1 on their seven-game road trip.

Allen Iverson had 30 points and seven assists and Jim Jackson added 22 points for the 76ers, who have six in a row.

Bird highlights 11 Hall of Fame nominees

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. — Larry Bird, a star on both the collegiate and NBA levels, was among eight players and three coaches to be nominated Monday for the Basketball Hall of Fame.

Bird, the national college player of the year at Indiana State, a three-time NBA MVP and a member of the league's 50th anniversary all-time team, was one of four first-time nominees among the players, but the only one who made it in his first year of eligibility.

Other first-time nominees were Adrian Dantley and Chet Walker, who had successful careers in both college and the NBA, and Marques Haynes, who entertained millions as the ballhandling wizard of the Harlem Globetrotters.

Nominated again as players were Larry Costello, an NBA all-star in half of his 12 seasons; Artis Gilmore, one of the stars who played in both the ABA and NBA; Gus Johnson, considered one of the best power forwards in NBA history; and Sidney Moncrief, the guard credited with making the Milwaukee Bucks one of the best NBA teams of the '80s.

The coaches nominated were Alex Hannum, one of two coaches to win titles in both the ABA and NBA, John Thompson, who has led Georgetown to one national championship and three Final Fours, and Tex Winter, an assistant coach with the Chicago Bulls for their five NBA titles and a long-time college coach.

Soccer player says media is out to get him

BRASILIA, Brazil — Ronaldo, the world's best soccer player, said Italian media are inventing stories to explain his recent slump.

Ronaldo's two-month goal-scoring drought ended Sunday when he scored the lone goal in Inter Milan's 1-0 win over Brescia for the Italian first-division championship.

Reports blamed his nightlife, too many commercials or his love life for the streak.

"I'm the first to admit that I have played badly, but let's analyze the reasons seriously and not with lies," he told the Brazilian weekly news magazine Isto E. "I haven't been in a discotheque for three months. I know perfectly well how I should behave."

Ronaldo, who at 21 was the world's best soccer player for the second time, said the media has over-hyped him.

"It was the Italian press that invented that I was a phenomenon," Ronaldo said. "I demand a little more professional respect ... find another description for me."

On this date ...

1944 — Syd Howe of the Detroit Red Wings scores six goals in a 12-6 victory over the New York Rangers.

1982 — Steve Mahre, twin brother of overall champion Phil Mahre, becomes the first American man to win a gold medal in Olympic or World Championship competition when he edges Sweden's Ingemar Stenmark by 0.51 seconds in the giant slalom.

1990 — Bill Shoemaker, the world's winningest jockey, finishes fourth on Patchy Groundfog in his final ride at Santa Anita. The 58-year-old Shoemaker finishes his 40-year career with $123,375,524 in earnings, a record 8,833 wins, 6,136 seconds and 4,987 thirds in 40,350 starts.

1996 — Visiting teams are 7-0, marking the first time in NBA history road clubs go undefeated on a day with more than five games. Expansion Toronto beats the Los Angeles Clippers 119-113 in overtime, Seattle defeats Houston 104-103 in overtime, Boston downs Miami 100-99, Portland tops Philadelphia 96-85, Sacramento defeats Detroit 94-85, Cleveland tops Milwaukee 111-88 and Minnesota downs Dallas 105-96.

JOHN STOUS
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's track and field program already has credit for one world-class decathlete and might have another budding.

Assistant track coach Steve Fritz took fourth place in the decathlon in the 1996 Olympics and won the event at the 1997 U.S. Outdoor Track and Field Championships.

Now, sophomore Attila Zsivoczky, a native of Budapest, Hungary, is setting new standards for K-State's multi-event athletes.

Last year as a freshman, Zsivoczky set the K-State indoor record for the heptathlon, scoring 5,404 points at the Wildcat Invitational. He also placed fourth at the European Championships in the 23-and-younger age group in the decathlon with 7,804 points, to place him second on the K-State outdoor honor roll behind Fritz.

"If I can beat Steve's records while I am here, I will be very happy," Zsivoczky said. "Not because it is the school record, but because I think that it is something to compare myself with on a level I want to get to."

He also brought accolades with him when he came to K-State. In 1994 at the World Junior Championships in Lisbon, Portugal, he finished fourth in the decathlon. Then in 1996, Zsivoczky won the decathlon at the World Junior Championships in Sydney, Australia.

"Winning the World Juniors was really good," Zsivoczky said. "It was a major international event and is not an easy thing to do."

K-State Coach Cliff Rovelto credited much of Zsivoczky's success to his work ethic, which Zsivoczky said came from his dad.

"Attila's work ethic is second to none, and I mean none," Rovelto said. "I have been around a few Olympians, and some of their work ethics pale in comparison to Attila's."

One of the main reasons Zsivoczky came to K-State was to be able to train in the presence of Fritz and be with other good coaches.

"When I was choosing schools, I thought that K-State would be the best for me," he said. "K-State may not be the richest school in the States, but I think it has the best coaches. Watching Steve train is a big motivation for me and gives me more strength to practice hard."

Zsivoczky is the son of two former Hungarian Olympians. His father, Gyula, was a three-time medalist in the hammer throw, winning second in the 1960 and 1964 Olympics before winning the gold medal in 1968. He also placed fifth in the 1972 games. His mother, Gyulane, participated in the 1968 and 1972 Olympics, placing ninth in the high jump in 1968.

"My parents have been very supportive of me," he said. "My dad writes my strength workout for me, and I don't know if it's in my genes or not, but I grew up in the environment where I was taught to never be satisfied and always work to get better. I just don't think I would feel very good if I didn't do everything possible to reach the goals I have set."

Rovelto said having world-class athletes for parents also helped Zsivoczky, because they could give him advice and help him reach high goals.

"One of the things that is a big attribute to Attila is that he knows what really good is," he said. "I know that with all that he has already accomplished, he still wants to be better. His dad won an Olympic gold medal — Attila wants to get to that level, too."

At this point, Zsivoczky said he is about 150 points away from one of his significant goals, the 2000 Olympic Games in Sydney.

"I need to be able to score around 150 more points to qualify for the 2000 Games, and I really want to go back to Sydney since that is where I won my World Junior Championship title," he said.

▶CATS UPSET AT WEEKEND MEET IN MISSOURI BY HAWKS, TIGERS; COACH BLAMES POOR MOTIVATION FOR LACKLUSTER PERFORMANCES.

JOEL WHITE
Kansas State Collegian

Upsets in the world of track and field are few and far between.

In Saturday's K-State-Kansas-Missouri Triangular at Columbia, Mo., the unexpected happened. The Wildcats suffered a defeat to a relatively untalented but overachieving Missouri Tiger track team.

"I don't want to take anything away from Missouri. They don't really have that much talent, but they did what they had to do to win," K-State Coach Cliff Rovelto said. "In the overall scheme of things, all it really means is that we don't have the jug sitting in the trophy case this year."

The Tigers won the internationally scored meet, which means each team scores two people in every event, with a combined men's and women's score of 252 1/2 points.

The Cats finished with 237 points and the Jayhawks scored 227 1/2 points.

Rovelto said the women's team had a number of good performances in an effort to bring the trophy home.

"We entered the fewest number of girls in the meet, and they outscored KU and Missouri," Rovelto said. "They did their part."

Sophomore sprinter Kimela West had strong performances in the 200-meter dash and the 55. She placed first in the 200 with a time of 25.22 seconds, and she finished second in the 55 with a time of 7.10.

Rachel Woods brought home two golds, one in the 400 and the other as a member of the 1,600-meter relay. She won the 400 in 57.23 seconds, and the 4x400 relay team finished in 3:53.24.

Other gold medal winners on the women's team were Emily Diederich in the 800, Vanitta Kinard in the triple jump, Renetta Seiler in the shot put and Anna Whitam in the weight throw.

Kinard's triple jump of 43 feet, 2 1/4 inches set a new Hearn Center record.

While Seiler won the shot put, she didn't compete in the weight throw — even though she has one of the top marks in the nation this year — because she was resting a sore hand.

Although K-State's women outscored the other two women's teams, West said they weren't flawless.

"The women took care of business, but we still thought we could have done better," West said.

Rovelto said that unlike the women, the K-State men failed to live up to their potential.

"We had a number of very, very poor efforts," Rovelto said. "We have a team that's far too talented to perform like we did."

Rovelto said he would accept the blame for the men being ill-prepared to compete.

"On the men's side, there were a couple of things that contributed to our poor showing," Rovelto said. "One is that we really downplayed this meet, and the other two schools did not downplay this meet. The other is that we didn't enter some of the guys that we could have because of injuries and other reasons."

K-State again took the top two spots in the high jump, with Charles Burney placing first and Nathan Leeper placing second. They both cleared 6 feet 11 1/2 inches, but Burney defeated Leeper because he had fewer misses.

Burney, who has a career-best high jump of 7 feet 4 1/2 inches, said he jumped poorly at Columbia.

"I was getting up. It's my approach that was bad," he said. "I'm ready physically. You can be ready physically, but if you're not ready technically, it's not going to happen."

However, Rovelto said every member of the men's team did not have a bad meet.

Senior sprinter Keith Black won the 55 in 6.46 seconds, the 200 in 21.70 seconds, and was part of the winning 1,600-meter relay team.

"Keith Black had a good day," Rovelto said. "He won the 55-meter dash and the 200, which are very short races for him, and he had a sore ankle."

Freshman middle distance runner Istvan Nagy, competing in his first meet as a Wildcat, placed second in the 600 and ran the first leg of the 1,600-meter relay.

Burney said for the most part, the men did not compete well, and that can be attributed to a false sense of security.

"Maybe we didn't take the other teams as seriously as we should have," Burney said. "Missouri and Kansas should be the least of our worries in the Big 12."

Intramural hoops team loses big, laughs hard

VIEWPOINT

D. SCOTT FRITCHEN
Scott is a senior in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Scott at dsf7477@ksu.edu.

True story: I saw a basketball team win by 96 points Thursday night. Ninety-six points. It was the season premiere of intramural co-rec basketball at Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, and I was sent to write about two teams whom I'd never heard of.

This team called "Yo Yo Ma's" was playing "Showtime," the defending co-rec football champions. I don't care if you're playing intramural Chinese Checkers. Yo Yo Ma's is a weird name for any team. Its six members wore baby-blue T-shirts with "Yo Yo Ma's" in military stencil. Fabulous. I loved it.

Especially with this one rule — guys couldn't go inside the lane, jump shots only. So, it was the women who flooded in inside, battled it out and shot layups. Another rule — instead of five-on-five, this was four-on-four, with two women on the floor at all times. This was great.

Showtime players shot pregame baskets on one end. Swish. Swish. Swish.

On the other end were Yo Yo Ma's. Boom. Clank. Nothing but air.

But these guys and girls were having fun. That's the point of intramurals, right? Good sportsman (or woman)-ship and all that mushy stuff.

OK, Showtime won 113-17. But that's beside the point.

What made the game so much fun, sadly at Yo Yo Ma's expense, was simply the fact you'll probably never see another basketball team lose this badly ever again.

Well, Steve Martini, associate director of recreational services, told me he'd seen intramural teams lose by 100 points a couple of times.

And my cousin told me about the time the Council Grove High School girl's team beat somebody by an unheard of amount because half the opposing players were suspended for drinking beer over winter break.

Another example — Missouri at K-State.

But you never understand the making of a slaughter until you witness the event. You always see the devastation left from a tornado, but have you ever seen it happen?

I did Thursday night. It wasn't pretty. But it was good entertainment.

It was like watching "Titanic." After the first five minutes, you're ready to see the darn ship sink. Roll the ending credits. The end. Goodbye.

Showtime began the game on a 44-1 scoring run. Yo Yo Ma's only point of the first half was a free throw by a guy who was beheaded while shooting a jump shot. Showtime showed full-court press and forced Yo Yo Ma's into 28 turnovers before the mercy of halftime, which momentarily ceased the 66-1 trampling.

You'd think the Yo Yo Ma's players would be angry, throwing sweatshirts, throwing referees, throwing each other. But they shook their heads. They forgot about the 15 airballs. They regrouped the way any team behind by 65 points would regroup.

"We need to start somewhere," a Yo Yo Ma's player said. "This is bad."

And a Yo Yo Ma's guy fed the ball to one of the women, who finally hit a layup with 15:26 remaining. An assembly of onlookers cheered and looked at the scoreboard. It was 72-3.

A male Yo Yo Ma's player hit a jump-shot to end a Showtime 20-0 scoring run midway through the second half, but the deficit was still 92-5.

And everybody but six players in baby blue waited patiently to see a hundred-point victory.

Remember the good sportsmanship, er, um, good sportswomanship part of it?

"I think this is the funniest thing I've done all my life," a Yo Yo Ma's girl said while laughing and waiting for the final minutes to expire.

"We're losing. Have some humor in it."

The score was 113-14 with a few seconds remaining when a guy from Yo Yo Ma's hit a three-pointer just before the ending buzzer.

The determined warrior stepped off the court and raised his arms in victory — moral victory. Yo Yo Ma's lost 113-17, but there would be no 100-point win Thursday night. The crowd roared.

Worst defeat?

"Ever." Kevin Day, the busy scorekeeper, said. "I've seen a lot of basketball."

And there was a female Showtime player who scored 48 points. She ripped shots from everywhere. She stole the ball. I think she led her team in rebounds. As one of only two women on this Showtime team, she was forced to play the entire game.

"How do I feel?" she snapped. "I'm tired. I'm going to go home and take a shower and go drink beer and then I'll feel better."

Beer. The drink of intramural champions.

Staging swordplay

ACTORS LEARN SWORD FIGHTING FOR PRODUCTION.

BRENNIA TALLEY
Kansas State Collegian

Hours of work are going into two-minute fight scenes in the upcoming K-State theater presentation of "Goodnight Desdemona."

In the play, "Goodnight Desdemona," Constance Ledbelly is an associate professor of English working on her thesis, who believes the plays "Othello" and "Romeo and Juliet" were meant to be comedies until Shakespeare eliminated the fools and made them tragedies.

Choreographed by Doug Hurley, senior in theater, sword fighting is involved in excerpts from the two Shakespeare plays, which come up again as experiences of Constance and the title character of "Goodnight Desdemona."

"It's sort of an Alice in Wonderland story," Kate Anderson, director of "Goodnight Desdemona," said. "She falls through her wastepaper basket and winds up in these plays and interacts with the characters."

The stage combat scenes that Hurley is perfecting are important to the play. The swords are potentially dangerous, he said. Cuing, acting and responding are integral parts to the fights.

Since his last play, "Man of La Mancha," Hurley has attended national and international stage combat workshops where his combat experience has grown.

"In the last couple of years, Doug has become very interested in combat and is developing beautifully in those areas," Anderson said.

Hurley's creativity is seen in one fight between Mercutio, played by Tyler Lansdown, and Tybalt, played by Michael Borgelt, both sophomores in theater. From an en garde stance, rapiers and daggers whip through the air and clink and clank together during blocks and lunges.

"The three things I think are important in a fighter are safety to the combatants and audience; making it look cool; and having it make sense to both the show and the sword fights, natural and circular," Hurley said.

Karl Rutherford, graduate student in theater and the play's stage manager, said

IVAN KOZAR/KSUCollegian
MICHAEL BORGELT AND TYLER LANSDOWN, SOPHOMORES IN THEATER, PRACTICE A SWORD-FIGHTING SCENE FOR A PLAY CALLED "GOODNIGHT DESDEMONA."

the fights are fun and good training, but it's important to remember it's not just one person's show.

"Acting is being in tune with another person on stage," Rutherford said. "In the fights, you're even more so in tune. You have to know the fight cold."

While Hurley concentrates on making things more visually exciting among the swords and comedy, technical elements are involved.

The fight scenes are important to acting's discipline and techniques, Anderson said.

"Combat embodies all of the things that acting does, like commitment, trust and person-to-person communication," she said.

'Park' moving, not canceled

MARY RENEE SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

A Union Program Council program adviser denied that "South Park" was being canceled after only two weeks.

"That is an absolutely false rumor," Paul Donovan said. "It is not being canceled at all. We are still showing it every Tuesday at noon. But it has been moved due to fire codes. Union Station holds 250 people, and we were at capacity."

There was also concern about the crowd affecting the newest addition to Union Station.

"There was some concern with Sharro in Union Station, that there will not be enough room for people to get pizza and sit down to eat," Donovan said.

The sometimes-controversial content of the Comedy Central animated series has raised a few eyebrows.

Teto Henderson, UPC program manager, said there have not been any complaints filed that he is aware of.

Donovan said Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement, did request to view an episode of "South Park." UPC made a copy of an episode and sent it to his office. Donovan said he did not know of any comment made by Bosco about the cartoon.

Student response has been loud and clear, Donovan said.

"The response has been excellent. We have had a lot of people request to have it shown at other times," he said.

More info?
"South Park" will be shown in the Union Little Theatre today. It can be viewed in the Union Ballroom the next two weeks and in the Little Theatre the following Tuesday.

Special fund to be created

the OOE, that covers the basic inflationary cost," he said. "Whatever the students and Foundation do is true improvements in niches we can really gain ground."

Coffman said the 1-percent increase depends on the passage of the proposed $1 per-credit-hour technology fee matched by $2 per credit hour in state funds. The passage of this proposal, now before the Legislature, is still too early to predict.

Coffman said if the technology initiative doesn't pass, it would have a detrimental effect on other programs, like the 1-percent OOE increase for the library.

The library has been a priority with both the administration and Foundation for at least six months, but it wasn't until last week's Foundation executive meeting that Hellebust took the proposal to the board. He said it will take much coalition building with donors, deans and administrators to make this work.

Hellebust said he "met with all the deans last week, and they all endorsed it."

Endowment money collected after the first of this year would count toward the plan, with the first payment on Jan. 1, 1999.

Wefald refers to the Foundation's approach to solving the Hale periodical crisis as "thinking outside the box."

"This is short-term until we can raise the $10 million endowment," Wefald said. "That is not an unreasonable goal."

Wefald said the Foundation money can only be viewed as short-term, because the market could slow and the returns could decrease to zero.

Hobrock said the library staff's emphasis on conservative management should lessen the effect of fewer Foundation funds from the new plan.

He said the next five years will mean a minimum of 5,000 journal subscriptions, with selective journal cuts negotiated on an annual basis. The cuts will focus on journals from the most expensive predatory publishers, but will not mean massive journal losses.

Hobrock is negotiating with Student Senate's Privilege Fee Committee about a possible student library fee of either $1 or $2 per credit hour per semester. A $1 per-credit-hour fee would result in $368,000 a year for the library.

The task force set a goal of $1.5 million additional money for the library, but the combination of state, Foundation and student support could conceivably result in only $1 million per year.

"We're trying to do the best we can do," Hobrock said, referring to the potential $500,000 shortfall. "Should students do twice as much as the state? I don't think so, but I'd like to have it."

Speaker advocates rights for terminally ill patients

Vacco vs. Quill was the first physician-assisted suicide case argued in front of the U.S. Supreme Court. Quill advocated a patient's right to die in extreme cases. The Court ruled terminally ill people do not have the right to die.

The Court also reaffirmed the right of a patient to refuse treatment and gave a green light for states to make their own laws about physician-assisted suicide, Quill said.

Physician-assisted suicide is an issue close to home for Kansans.

Beverly Earles-Law, UFM coordinator, said the Kansas Legislature is discussing plans to tighten the ban on physician-assisted suicide.

But for some, physician-assisted suicide seems of distant importance.

"Being a college student, it's not something I think about. I didn't know that a side of the whole issue was to give people a choice," Bree Hedman, freshman in engineering, said.

Texas executes woman for 1st time since Civil War era

ASSOCIATED PRESS

HUNTSVILLE, Texas — Karla Faye Tucker, the pickax killer whose born-again Christianity sparked a worldwide debate about redemption and retribution on death row, was executed Tuesday for hacking a man and woman to death during a 1983 break-in.

Tucker, 38, was declared dead by injection at 6:45 p.m. She became the first woman executed in Texas since the Civil War, and the first nationwide since 1984.

In her final words, Tucker expressed love for her family and husband and apologized to her victims' families.

"I hope God will give you peace with this," she said.

"I am going to be face to face with Jesus now. I love all of you very much," she said. "I will see you all when you get there. I will wait for you."

Richard Thornton, husband of victim Deborah Thornton, witnessed the execution and spoke to his wife as it proceeded.

"Here she comes, baby doll," said Thornton, who has vigorously supported Tucker's execution. "She's all yours. The world's a better place."

Other witnesses held hands and cried. "I love you, Karla," Kari Weeks, Tucker's sister, said.

Outside, hundreds of people and hordes of news reporters waited for word about the execution. When prison officials and witnesses emerged, many cheered.

The execution came less than an hour after the U.S. Supreme Court rejected an 11th-hour appeal and Gov. George W. Bush refused to grant a 30-day reprieve, saying her case had been thoroughly reviewed by appellate courts.

"I have concluded judgment about the heart and soul of an individual on death row are best left to a higher authority," Bush said. "May God bless Karla Faye Tucker and God bless her victims and their families."

Earlier Tuesday, the Supreme Court had rejected another appeal in which Tucker had argued that the clemency process in Texas is unconstitutional.

Worldwide publicity about Tucker's case, including pleas for mercy from Pope John Paul II and TV evangelist Pat Robertson, focused on her metamorphosis from a drug-crazed teen-age prostitute to a soft-spoken young woman who would be content with a life sentence.

People on both sides of her case, and Tucker herself, said her sex should have no bearing on her punishment. But the novelty of executing a woman — there were only 49 among 3,365 death-row inmates nationwide as of Jan. 1 — prompted hundreds of reporters and photographers to descend on Huntsville, where executions in recent years have become almost routine.

Nationally, since the Supreme Court in 1976 allowed capital punishment to resume, 431 men and one woman have been executed — 144 of them in Texas, by far the most active death-penalty state.

The last execution of a woman in Texas was in 1863, when Chipita Rodriguez was hanged from a mesquite tree for the ax murder of a horse trader during a robbery.

Nationwide, the last woman executed was Velma Barfield, a born-again Christian who was put to death in North Carolina in 1984 for lacing her boyfriend's food with rat poison.

On Monday, the Board of Pardons and Paroles rejected Tucker's bid, 16-0, to get her sentence commuted to life in prison, just as it denied all 76 requests for clemency made by condemned men since 1993.

Bush, who took office three years ago, has let 59 condemned men go to their deaths without once commuting or delaying a death sentence.

In numerous TV interviews, the 5-foot-3 dark-eyed, dark-haired woman portrayed herself as someone who had been rehabilitated and wanted a life sentence so she could help others behind bars.

Sewer problems change Anderson expansion plan

MATT KREPS

Kansas State Collegian

The Manhattan City Commission approved motions for changes in the Anderson Avenue expansion project and received reports of savings on City Hall renovations at Tuesday night's meeting.

In preparing for the Anderson Avenue project, city officials found the new storm sewers would intersect with waste sewers owned by K-State.

City Engineer Jack Messer asked the city to approve an additional $9,000 to hire a consulting firm to design a plan to relocate the university-owned sewers. Further money will be allotted for the actual construction at a later date.

"We have not established that at this point, and I'd hate to venture a guess," Messer said of the construction costs.

City Commissioner Karen McCulloh once again reiterated flooding concerns that led to her vote against the expansion project on Dec. 16.

"I can just sort of see Aggieville awash, and that would not be a happy situation," she said.

The City Commission received good news from its City Hall expansion project now under way.

Asbestos removal is almost complete and is expected to cost more than $200,000 less than was budgeted, city administrators said. The last asbestos removal is expected to be completed by April 1.

The commission approved almost $36,000 in additional funds to level flooring in the older portions of the building.

Uneven floors due to past renovations created changes of more than an inch in the floors. Filling gouges and leveling the floor would make the overall renovations better, said Patrick Schaub, a representative of Brent Bowman and Associates, the architectural firm overseeing the construction.

In other business, the commission also discussed the proposed annexation of the Sargent Addition north of Manhattan. The city wants to pursue annexation and subsequent installation of water and sewer services after reports of well-water contamination.

Residents expressed concern about costs that would be levied as taxes to pay for necessary improvements to the area if the annexation passes. Betty Kleiner, an area resident, voiced a complaint echoed by other residents.

"I'm not the only older person in the area with one paycheck," she said.

Other residents said the city should bear the cost of the improvements because it is pushing for the annexation, not the residents.

"If we asked for the benefit district, then we should pay for it, and if the city wants it then they should pay for it," another Sargent resident said.

The commission voted 4-1 to accept the ordinance as read.

McCulloh said she supports the improvements because they will lead to improvements for the residents.

"While there are costs, there are also increases in your property values," she said.

Ed Klimek, the lone vote against the proposal, said he thought the commission should work on a progressive plan with the residents rather than the swift annexation.

"The most acceptable way to annex is to annex ground and not ground with houses," he said.

Board of Student Publications to discuss director's job status

TRAVIS D. LENKNER

Kansas State Collegian

A special meeting of the Board of Student Publications was scheduled for 7 a.m. this morning to discuss the Student Publications director's contract.

Board member Carlton Getz said Tuesday the meeting was called to discuss Director Ron Johnson's employment status.

Getz and two other board members — Gabe Eckert and Jason Ellis — wrote board chairman Todd Simon last week to request a meeting to discuss personnel matters.

Johnson directs Student Publications Inc., which publishes the Collegian, Royal Purple yearbook and the Campus Phone Book. Just more than one-fourth of the company's budget comes from student privilege fees.

Privilege Fee Committee members said they were insulted by Johnson's remarks during one of their meetings last fall. Johnson's statements about the Student Publications equipment fee were in response to a clerical error that cost Student Publications more than $120,000 in student fee money.

Committee Vice Chair Aaron Truax said Johnson's comments were offensive.

"There were some definite personal attacks toward me, and other committee members also expressed that they were offended by what was said," Truax said.

Getz, also a student senator, said dismissing Johnson could be justified in order to keep Privilege Fee Committee members from drastically decreasing the Student Publications fee when it comes up for review later this month.

"We need to make sure that we put the best possible face toward Privilege Fee, whether that means a dismissal, reassignment or making sure he doesn't do that again."

Simon said pairing Johnson's job performance with success in the privilege fee review process was inaccurate.

"If he's framing it that way, that's absurd. They're separate issues," Simon said. "There are five elected student representatives on the Board of Student Publications, and along with the rest of the directors, it's their job to look at how Ron's doing his work."

Johnson said he knew about the meeting, but hadn't been officially told about any allegations.

"I have never received any information about complaints. All that's been happening has been going on behind the scenes," he said. "Nobody has seen fit to share those with me at this point."

Though Getz said he and other board members would consider Johnson's dismissal, Simon said the Board of Student Publications doesn't have the power to make that happen. Half of Johnson's days are spent working for Student Publications. He is also a half-time journalism instructor.

Though half of Johnson's salary is from the Student Publications budget, Simon said his

SHARPTON SPEAKS

IVAN KOZAR/Collegian

THE REV. AL SHARPTON, CIVIL RIGHTS AND POLITICAL ACTIVIST, SPOKE TUESDAY NIGHT IN MCCAIN AUDITORIUM. SHARPTON WAS THE KEYNOTE SPEAKER FOR K-STATE'S CELEBRATION OF BLACK HISTORY MONTH. THE SPEECH FOCUSED ON AFRICAN-AMERICANS IN BUSINESS.

Reverend urges economic empowerment

JENNIFER LUCKE

Kansas State Collegian

The Rev. Al Sharpton said during a lecture Tuesday that today's generation of black people must invest in its own communities to gain economic empowerment.

Sponsored by Black Student Union, Sharpton, the president of the National Action Network, was the keynote speaker for Black History Month.

Sharpton said black Americans fought through four stages of empowerment. The first three were freedom from slavery, the right to equality in public accommodations and the right to vote. The fourth, which black Americans are battling now, is the fight for economic empowerment.

"We can sit in the front of the bus or the plane, but the problem is we can't afford it," Sharpton said.

Sharpton said those who think corporate investment in the urban community will help develop the black community financially are wrong. He said unless corporations hire black professionals and bank in local banks, they are simply making a profit, and not contributing to the people of the community.

"Unless there is some mutual flow of monies, that in itself will not do much for many," Sharpton said.

Sharpton said the "glass ceiling" is preventing economic empowerment. He discussed the 1996 Texaco scandal, in which white executives talked about how to prevent black people from reaching higher corporate levels.

If these kinds of scenarios still happen, the black community has a long way to go, Sharpton said.

Sharpton discussed affirmative action, saying black people have been discriminated against throughout American history, and most opportunities were for white people.

"America was built on affirmative action. They just didn't have it for blacks," Sharpton said.

The Homestead Act of 1862, which gave white people 160 acres of farmland, is an example of early pro-white affirmative action, Sharpton said.

Black access to mainstream society is being cut off as a result of the backlash against today's affirmative action, Sharpton said. He explained that government investments in farmers, corporations and foreign nations is considered good policy. Investing money in urban areas is considered bad domestic policy.

"I was taught that charity begins at home," Sharpton said.

Sharpton said black people should fight toward economic empowerment instead of waiting for corporate or government intervention.

"It is far more significant to me to build our own businesses and to stabilize our own community," Sharpton said.

The most consistent market base in the world is the black community, Sharpton said. He said money within the community should be recycled in the community instead of spent outside the area.

Sharpton told students what they can do to battle for economic empowerment. He challenged today's generation of black college students to analyze its values. He encouraged it to deal with the broader questions.

Individual development should not be the only goal of today's young black people, Sharpton said. No one can function as an island, he said.

"This generation should not be remembered as just a generation of individualism," Sharpton said.

Sharpton said the challenge of this generation is to deal with the economic question, as previous generations dealt with the questions of slavery and the right to vote.

Sharpton gave black college students advice for their futures.

"Don't just study black history, make some."

Agricultural economics department receives grant to be awarded to new graduate students

A $108,000 grant has been awarded to K-State's Department of Agricultural Economics. Daniel Bernardo, professor of agricultural economics, said these competitive grants were awarded by the U.S. Department of Agriculture. Bernardo said the grant will be awarded to two new graduate fellows in the agricultural economics department. "The goal of the grant is to produce doctoral graduates in areas of national need in food and agricultural sciences," Bernardo said. The three-year fellowship is for a doctoral degree in agricultural business or agricultural marketing. "This grant will greatly assist in the shortfalls in graduate student financing," Bernardo said.

Sean Fox, assistant professor of agricultural economics, said the stipends are about $18,000 each year plus additional funding for travel.

The department is recruiting for fellowships immediately. Bernardo said the applicants must be new graduate students planning to study in the areas of agricultural business, food safety or food marketing.

To apply, students complete regular graduate applications. Fox said the applicants will also submit reference letters, grade point averages and visit the professors of the departments. He said he expected between 24 and 30 applicants.

Fox said he is thrilled to receive the grant. "These will be the seventh and eighth students funded by this program in the last six years," he said.

Michael Boland, assistant professor of agricultural economics, said K-State was chosen because of its good reputation and high performances of previous students in the department.

The graduate fellows will be led by faculty members who are also fellowship winners. Boland is a recipient of a fellowship.

Three current faculty members were recipients of former USDA National Needs Fellowships in Agribusiness and Marketing.

White supremacist leader creates controversy during Tulsa's mayoral Republican primary

TULSA, Okla. — An outspoken white separatist who operates a "Dial-a-Racist" hot line came in a distant fourth in the city's Republican mayoral primary on Tuesday, losing badly to a former GOP county leader.

With 82 percent of precincts reporting, former Tulsa County Republican chairman Terry Simonson received 8,749 votes, or more than 75 percent of the vote, easily defeating five rivals.

Some key Republicans had feared name recognition would propel White Aryan Resistance leader Dennis Mahon to victory, and Simonson entered the race at the last minute, saying he feared Mahon could incite people to violence or racist behavior.

"I think people voted for me and my message, and at the same time sent Mr. Mahon a message that says 'Your racist or separatist views are not welcome and will never be welcomed in Tulsa, Oklahoma,'" said Simonson, an attorney.

Gov. Frank Keating, a Republican, even took the rare step of endorsing a candidate in the primary, urging voters to back Simonson and reject Mahon's message of hate and ugliness.

Mahon said Simonson could not have won without Keating's support.

"What do they fear about me?" he said. "They know I tell the truth."

Mahon's name recognition stems partly from allegations made by his ex-girlfriend, Carol Howe. The former government informant claimed she overheard Mahon discuss blowing up federal buildings in the months before the Oklahoma City bombing in April 1995.

Diary tells of K-State's roots

AMY EBERT
Kansas State Collegian

Joseph Denison, first president of Kansas State Agricultural College, kept a detailed diary of his work as a minister, father and husband during 1884.

His diary is now at K-State. Denison was president from K-State's beginning as a public university in 1863 until he resigned in 1873.

The diary was kept after Denison left K-State, while he was serving as the minister at the Valley Falls, Kan., Methodist Church.

Michaeline Chance-Reay, instructor of secondary education, found Denison's great-granddaughter while researching for a book she is writing about the first ladies of K-State.

Sara Frances Ames Stamatoff, Denison's great-granddaughter, had the diary. It had remained in the family through the years and is in good condition, Chance-Reay said.

"The diary was at Baker University, and it was transferred here to the archives in December and in good condition," she said.

Both Denison and Stamatoff were associated with Baker University, and it had been on display there for some time.

When Chance-Reay initially contacted Stamatoff by letter, she said she was surprised at Stamatoff's prompt response and cooperation.

The letter of inquiry intrigued Stamatoff, and she wanted to know more about K-State. She and her son, James Stamatoff, visited Manhattan last summer, Chance-Reay said.

"She came to Manhattan and saw the Denison home, monument, grave site, Denison Street, Denison Hall and the Blumont Bell as well," Chance-Reay said.

The Stamatoffs weren't aware of Denison's influence on Manhattan and the university until they visited, she said.

"After seeing the impact he made on the community, they said they would like to donate the diary to the archives," Chance-Reay said.

Along with the diary, replicas of many photographs were also donated to the university archives, including pictures of Denison and his family members.

Tony Crawford, university archivist, said receiving the piece of history is important to the university.

"The diary is very unique in that it was kept after his term at K-State, therefore it shares some Kansas history as well as being one of the few artifacts from the first presidents," Crawford said.

Artifacts from university presidents, especially the earlier presidents, are difficult to find, he said.

"We are very pleased to get this diary from the first president, because nowadays, with all the computer technology and other stuff, handwritten artifacts like this are hard to come by," Crawford said.

Many artifacts, or primary sources of information such as letters, diaries and interviews, are donated to the university regularly, said Pat Patton, library assistant with the university archives.

The diary is kept in the archives on the fifth floor of Hale Library and is available for anyone to see.

"That's the beauty of having it, people have access to it now," Chance-Reay said.

CLIF PALMBERG/Collegian

RECENTLY, THE DIARY OF JOSEPH DENISON, FIRST PRESIDENT OF K-STATE, WAS DONATED TO THE UNIVERSITY BY DENISON'S GREAT-GRANDDAUGHTER, SARA FRANCES AMES STAMATOFF.

1st K-State president raised money for tornado-ravaged church

AMY EBERT
Kansas State Collegian

The first president of Kansas State Agricultural College, Joseph Denison, traveled around Kansas as a Methodist minister, dedicated a new church and buried his daughter all in 1884.

The record of all the events are recorded in his diary of that year, which has been donated to K-State. The diary, a small black book, documents Denison's daily work.

In June 1883, a tornado destroyed the Valley Falls, Kan., Methodist Church where he was serving as the minister. Denison raised the $3,000 necessary to rebuild and furnish the church, said Michaeline Chance-Reay, an instructor of secondary education, who located the diary when researching K-State history.

"That's a lot of money, especially in 1883. And he raised it in time to rebuild the church and have its dedication in January 1884," Chance-Reay said.

Denison's effort to raise the money is a part of the Valley Falls United Methodist Church's history, said the Rev. Donna Votau-Messier, who is the minister at the church today.

"He traveled to raise money, not only locally, but he traveled to Philadelphia, Ohio and possibly Rhode Island," she said.

On Feb. 3, 1884, Denison noted in his diary that he preached in the new church for the first time. He also taught Sunday school to the children of the congregation.

Along with the entries of joy, Denison also endured loss during 1884, said Chance-Reay. On June 14, 1884, his daughter, Ella, died after stomach complications following the birth of her daughter Ethel.

"Ella gave birth to a daughter and died four months later, so Mr. and Mrs. Denison took care of the child," Chance-Reay said.

Besides taking care of his family, Denison traveled throughout Kansas as a minister to many Kansas churches. The diary recorded when and where he preached, whom he stayed with, and how much he was paid by the congregation for his service.

"The detail of the diary is also amazing. In the back he has a listing of the amounts of money he collected at each church," Chance-Reay said.

Although the diary does not mention his work at K-State, Chance-Reay said it is important to have artifacts like it.

"It actually belonged to him as an artifact. I don't know if there is anything else like this here that belonged to him," she said.

Committee plans survey to determine K-State students' willingness to pay Lafene user fee

NATE JENKINS
Kansas State Collegian

Administrators want to know if students would support a user fee at Lafene Health Center.

It's Student Health Advisory Committee members' job to find out.

With the help of Len Bloomquist, sociology, anthropology and social work professor, SHAC members said they hope to have a scientific survey prepared by the end of this semester and ready to present to students by fall 1998.

Guidelines for the survey, outlined in a memorandum to SHAC from Vice President for Institutional Advancement Robert Krause, focus on finding whether a per-visit charge would keep students from using Lafene's services.

Students will be surveyed a number of times during the year, depending on how comprehensive SHAC members think the study should be. The survey will at least be conducted during high-volume periods such as flu season.

Krause also recommended getting information from different types of users and categorizing the survey sample by gender, purpose for office visit and first-time users as compared with frequent users.

Though the survey is still in the early planning stage, SHAC Chair Julie Tarara said the committee will make it a top priority this semester.

"Hopefully, we'll have a survey done by the end of this semester," Tarara said. "We need to find out whether students are in favor of a user fee or not, and we can't do it without a good survey."

Debate about the user charge began last semester when Lafene administrators asked the Privilege Fee Committee to increase the student-health fee. A 4-percent increase was passed by Student Senate, but only after senators removed a stipulation from the bill that would have charged students $5 for each visit with a health professional.

Administrators objected to the user-fee idea, calling for a survey of students before a fee could be implemented. SHAC members also questioned how practical a per-visit charge would be for students.

Neither Tarara nor Lafene Health Center Director Lannie Zweimiller would comment on their personal opinions about a user fee for Lafene.

"We just want to be as objective as possible," Zweimiller said.

Students need to support fee creation for library

We support the creation of a $1 per-credit-hour privilege fee to significantly improve Hale Library, but with one condition. There should be a sunset clause so after five years, the fee would end. In half a decade, the administration should examine its options and continue to lobby for continued support of the library. The creation of this student fee would supply one-third of the money needed to help solve funding shortages in journal subscriptions and the acquisition of books. This should be a short-term solution to make noticeable improvements and meet the needs of undergraduates, in addition to allocating money to journals that is more of a help to graduate students and faculty. The other two revenue sources, state funding and KSU Foundation money, will provide the remaining two-thirds. The administration should be commended for working to find innovative solutions to this problem. When you're in a tight spot, people can come up with creative solutions. This is what they've done. The KSU Foundation specifically is using a previously untapped resource to provide nearly $300,000 in support. Although there's little doubt this problem might have been avoided with better planning, it's better late than never. As some of the behind-the-scenes work finally comes to fruition, there needs to be more coalition building with donors, deans and administrators to make this work.

Instead of an increase in tuition, this fee would specifically earmark money for the improvement of the library and empower students to increase the quality of an essential campus resource. During what remains of the fee season, Student Governing Association should schedule forums and meet with constituents. Two-thirds of the funding proposed will come from lobbying work done by the administration. Now, the students need to commit to stocking their library.

Video Games

A device quickly becoming the spawn of Satan

I've become an addict. There, I said it. I'm sick of trying to tell myself I'm not. For years I've shown all the signs and exhibited the characteristic behavior of an addict. It hasn't been until now that I can finally come clean and honestly say that I'm addicted to video games. Now, after that buildup, some of you might be disappointed with the video game topic. But let me assure you, it's no small matter. In fact, this habit might be the unbreakable habit. It's a habit more addictive than smoking and could be twice as volatile as shooting smack. This is what I and many like me are now facing. Now usually when it comes to addictions, the person either doesn't realize or refuses to admit it until it's too late. I was the same way. Even though it's too late for me, I think maybe I can help others by telling my story. Hi, I'm David, and I'm a game-a-holic. Different people have different types of video-game addictions, depending on what game system they own. Just like some people adore heroin while others revel in hallucinogens, there are gamers who live and die for their Nintendo 64 and others who blow all their cash on computer games. My fix happens to come in the form of a Sony Playstation. For those of you who don't know what that is — and I'm sure there aren't many of you — it's a video game system, like an Atari, but it runs off of compact discs. The graphics and sound are light years away from Pong, and some games are only a few inches shy of a significant box-office production. I was first introduced to the Playstation when I was a sophomore. One of my buddies, Jeremy, owned one and was always playing it when I went to his pad. I would show up, sit down beside him, take him on in some Mortal Kombat or whatever the game of the evening was, and then I'd leave. That's how it begins: someone introduces it to you, and it slowly builds. As the year pushed forward, I found myself on campus in the middle of the day yearning to play. Some days I would go straight to his apartment after classes just to catch a quick buzz before going home. Then came the summer, and Jeremy and his Playstation went home. For the next three months I stayed clean as a whistle and suffered no consequences. There were no uncontrollable cravings, night sweats or cases of the shakes. I had pretty much forgotten about the Playstation and all the late nights we spent thumbing those controls like some possessed mad men. I had quit cold turkey and thought nothing of it. The next fall, Jeremy moved in with me and one of my friends and with him came the dope. It didn't seem like a pressing matter at the time. We knew he owned the thing and really never gave it any thought. We were pretty much unprepared for what that thing would do to us in the coming semester. It had become all too accessible. It was there by the television, staring me in the face every time I walked in the door. I'd come home from class only to waste the two-hour break I had by playing it. It would be there at night, calling my name while I was doing homework or anything else constructive. Some days, the first thing I would do was turn on the Playstation and get in a couple rounds of WORMS or Tekken 2 before going to class, but it hadn't gotten bad yet. Jeremy was always playing the damn thing, so that left less time for us. As the semester passed, he played more and more, and we got more engulfed by school. The Playstation became an infrequent high, used only when we didn't have much else to do. The following semester, Jeremy left school to move back home. For whatever reason, he didn't make grades and decided to take some time off. I'm still under the strong impression that it was his love for the games and his devotion to mastering them that led to his farewell. He was good at all of them and spent most of his time proving that point. He'd rent a game and master it in the same day, which often times meant skipping classes to do it. It was on that sad day, when I found out he wasn't coming back, that I damned all video games. Time passed, and a new year dawned. My other roommate and I moved in with three other fellows and the prospect of my senior year appeared bright. All was going well until that fateful day in October when one of our friends gave us his Playstation. He said he had a lot of stuff to do for the next couple months, and he wanted it out of his house for a while. Smart guy. We gladly accepted, thinking nothing of the curse he had just bestowed upon us.

From that day on our basement living room turned into the den of addiction. On any given night you could walk in to find one roommate deeply engrossed, playing his heart out with three or four others anxiously waiting to play. The picture was not much different from that of a room full of baseheads waiting for their turn on the crack pipe.

In fact, we nicknamed both controllers Crack Pipe 1 and Crack Pipe 2. Suing names, I think. Then, our buddy came to collect. He was done with all of his stuff and wanted it back. Can you say, withdrawal? We had to find a substitute. We began playing one of my roommates' old Nintendo systems that he had when he was a child, but it just wasn't the same. We had to think. We had to fill the void. My girlfriend! She had a Playstation, and it was just sitting in her apartment collecting dust. That was the answer! After my roommates and I pleaded our case for a few days she finally agreed to let us borrow it. "Borrow" is the key term in that sentence. When I strode into the living room with her Playstation in hand, everyone acted as if I had brought back the last ration of food on earth. Well, I'm reluctant to say it's still in our possession and has somehow made its way into my room. Yep, I am now the keeper of the crack pipes. I'm the dealer who provides the fix to my friends. Now I run the same risk as my old roommate. Now I have gone against my own damnation. Now I have become the addict. I really don't think it'll make me get bad grades or run me out of school. At least I hope not. That just has to do with responsibility. But what I know is this: no matter what system you play on or what games you play, the addiction can happen. And without monitoring the addiction, you could be headed for video-game ruin.

Arrival experiences deadened by city sprawl

VIEWPOINT
RUSSELL FORTMEYER

Walk into a small cafe in any Kansas town and ask where the "new addition" is, and you're likely to receive the same answer from everyone. The new addition — not the music group "New Edition" — is that Midwestern oddity, quite prevalent in Kansas, of town planning that opened up land for subdivisions of new houses in the 1960s, '70s and '80s. Also key to the new addition aesthetic is the requirement that these subdivisions be entirely removed from the historic center of town and off-line with its traditional street grid. In other words, at odds with the town.

Therefore, drive into any small Kansas town and you'll notice at least two distinct regions: the old neighborhoods fanning out from a human-scaled downtown and a large subdivision of ranch-style homes with brick veneer located somewhere on the fringes of town. The third region, which we won't discuss today, is the industrial park that all Kansas towns built in the hopes of luring industry. Naturally, most of these "parks" failed miserably. To give you an idea of how sick and wrong society has become, these new additions are considered the prime real estate in town anymore. Instead of large two-story homes with hard wood floors, front porches, detached garages, oversized attics and basements, the new standard in housing became sprawling ranch houses with an over-sized lot, zero architectural detail, no porch, garage entry directly on street facade and open floor plans. This new standard is even more popular today, however much the quality of construction has stripped it down even more to that of a disposable home. Small towns don't have the volume of new homes that Wichita or Johnson County boasts, for example, which makes each addition all the more important. In a small town that has few economic resources save that of families who have chosen to make their homes there, new construction and planning should not be taken lightly. There is no need for the big-city suburban model to be transplanted onto a town with a centralized population and slow growth rate. Instead of limiting new construction to the town limits, small towns have instead opened their borders to as much expansion as developers have needed, recklessly wasting any coherency left in our small towns. This is why a number of old open lots littered throughout towns will never be built upon — the approach being that the one resource small towns have in abundance is open land. So why not use it? And those new homes on the outskirts need new sewer lines, electrical service, parks and roads. In larger cities, that sprawl also demands freeways, grocery stores and schools. It's doubtful there will ever be need for a freeway in Herrington or even Manhattan. I've lamented the haphazard development of Pottawatomie County before, particularly that zone of confusion that exists between Manhattan and Wamego. For the time being, the most noticeable side effect of all of this four-lane highway construction our city and county commissions have demanded is the grotesque, misplaced strip of residential and commercial buildings that have begun to line these highways. Aside from the occasional forgivable farmhouse, these mini-subdivisions of four and five estates have no business in the countryside. Driving to Wamego from Manhattan becomes, instead of a pleasant drive through the country, a relentless pursuit on the senses: Oh, look Honey, a Mansard roof in Kansas; there must have been a sale on aluminum siding last year; or more quasi-French country, multi-gabled half-brick homes one would care to see in a lifetime. Arriving in Manhattan, or any small town/city in Kansas, is no longer an event, no longer the denouement at the end of a lengthy mystery. This experience has been reduced to a stock character — the strips of residential and commercial construction leading one into town blur the line between country/city. Instead of a rational conveyance from natural to built environment, we are left with semi-grand spectacles that try to create arrival events — well-meaning signs proclaiming "Welcome to Newton" or, as in Manhattan, a rather unexceptional bridge. In that way, new additions or sprawl, as we have seen, serve to destabilize the experience of a town; sprawl only reinforces property values and the pocketbooks of developers while taking a chunk of the country from us and giving it to a them. While it's true that downtown Manhattan, along with Aggieville and K-State, is a pleasant place, it's the arrival, the places in between the center and the country, that need the most attention.

Band budget increase fails to meet all needs

ANGELA KISTNER
Kansas State Collegian

The KSU Marching Band received an $18,000 increase in its budget from the student privilege fee, but Director Frank Tracz said this, added to the band's previously $85,000 budget, still isn't enough to provide for all its needs.

Tracz said the band needs more money to pay for instrument repairs, new instruments and uniforms because band membership has increased. Five years ago, Tracz said 125 members marched in the band. This year, 301 students participate.

The recent $18,000 budget increase is the only increase the band has received in those five years, he said.

"You can never have enough money," he said. "You never know when a baritone player could be running across the field and trip. He goes one way, and the baritone goes another way. That could be about a $600 repair."

Tracz said some students have their own instruments, but the band buys a lot of instruments.

"Nobody owns a sousaphone. We also supply a marching baritone and a marching French horn. These are all special instruments," Tracz said.

The band bought four new sousaphones, which cost about $7,500 each. Tracz said the band rents some instruments on a rent-to-own program, paying them off within three years. But when that cycle is complete, Tracz said, it's always time to replace those instruments again.

Todd Bennett, section leader for clarinets and senior in chemistry, said some of the uniforms are in bad shape.

"Many have places torn on them, and one year it rained every game, so some still have mildew," he said.

Besides costs for band uniforms, there is also the cost of flag corps uniforms and Classy Cat uniforms.

"You can only wear a Classy Cat uniform for so long before you need to retire it for something new," Tracz said.

The band gets some of the extra money it needs from fund raising.

Bennett said some of the band's money makers include sponsoring the Central State Marching Festival for high school bands, a concert band clinic and a Jazz Festival.

The band also has a music run in the fall. Members ask for pledges for each lap they run around the track, Bennett said.

"It's a lot of fun. Usually there is music playing. It's real relaxed," he said. "I think we've had people get up to 30 laps in an hour, but most range from about 10 to 20."

Most of the support for the music run comes from family members, Bennett said. The run raises a lot of money, but not as much as Tracz would like, he said.

The band is also working on a five-year plan for funding, Tracz said.

"We have $160,000 in needs in terms of instruments. We are working on a plan of attack to get money from alumni," he said.

"We would also like to set up an endowment for permanent replacement of instruments. That's going to be much more than $160,000."

Tracz said he wants to plan so the band doesn't have to ask for money all the time.

"Sometimes you get tired of begging and borrowing," he said.

Library Task Force attempts to resolve periodical conflict

TIM RICHARDSON
Kansas State Collegian

Library Task Force member Michael Suleiman's interest in Arabic academic journals was not sufficient to keep them in Hale Library. Rather than lose access to the journals, he decided to add them to his personal library.

He has spent thousands of dollars to keep these journals, which were facing cancellation because of price inflation.

In the past 12 years, journal costs have increased at an average of 14 percent per year, but the library's budget has not shared a similar increase. Many journal titles have been canceled to accommodate rising costs.

The decline in journals is particularly important to faculty members. Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock said the journals provide faculty with important research resources.

"They are essential," he said. "Their whole careers are based on publishing in these journals and finding out what other people are doing."

Hobrock said the library hopes to earn $1 million next year, which could be possible with the help of a student privilege fee and money from the KSU Foundation. Allocations from state money will also contribute about $328,000.

Library Task Force Chairwoman Cynthia McCahon said many other university libraries are confronting problems of rising journal costs, but K-State remains near the bottom when incorporating the library's total budget, the number of periodicals it subscribes to and books it owns.

Many universities have received money by charging a student fee, and others have been funded by money from their athletic departments. McCahon said some universities are beginning to rebel against the firms that publish journals and that a virtual monopoly exists in the field of academic publishing. Government involvement is virtually impossible, because a majority of the publishers are in Europe.

"A lot of schools are banding together to say 'This is crazy, we aren't going to take it anymore,'" McCahon said.

Leu Cocke, member of the Library Task Force, said students, faculty and the state should do their part in contributing to the library. He said a lack of adequate journals makes it difficult for faculty to conduct cutting-edge research.

Cocke said the library must decide which journals would serve the most faculty members, and which journals' cancellation would do the least damage to the university.

"There is a continuous process going on to optimize — to keep the most important journals," Cocke said.

The myth that the Internet contains necessary information for research purposes is false, Hobrock said. He said cyberspace contains no free information that can match the quality of information in the journals.

"It's just like cable TV — it's a common device for television," he said. "But if you want something of quality, it's pay-per-view."

Cocke said with the lack of a central source to control information on the Internet, it is impossible to know what disseminated information is from a credible source.

"The Internet does not begin to have one tiny fraction of the information the journals provide," he said.

Hobrock said electronic journals create other problems for faculty.

To receive some electronic journals, the library must also subscribe to the print title of the journal, occasionally adding to the cost. He said faculty conducting research often come across new ideas by browsing the pages of the journal, which would be eliminated electronically.

"There is a lot of development in that area, but it hasn't reached the point where it amounts to much," Hobrock said.

A pay-per-view option of purchasing academic articles was introduced to the library in January. The average amount to purchase the full text of an article is $16.

"The faculty feels that by having a full journal in their hands, they get ideas," Hobrock said. "If they have to buy every article before they read it, it will get in the way of scholarship."

McCahon said as the journal prices continue to increase, the library will continue to cut back on the number of journals it purchases.

"It would be a sad day for education and the university if this continues,"

Suleiman said.

Hobrock said the university must continue to provide faculty with the correct resources to conduct valuable research and that there is no reason to believe the rate of inflationary prices will decrease soon.

"If we continue to spend less and less on the books and journals, the university may as well close its doors," Hobrock said.

Kids' Cafe teaches meal skills

CULINARY PROGRAM MIXES NUTRITION WITH EDUCATION, MORE VOLUNTEERS NEEDED

KELLY REDDING
Kansas State Collegian

Human ecology students and the Boys and Girls Club of Manhattan have teamed up to teach area youths dinner-time facts.

Known as Kids' Cafe, the program was started as a mandatory class project for students enrolled in the Introduction to Professional Dietetic Practice class, which is taught by Deborah Canter, professor of dietetics.

"I thought, 'Here's a chance for the students to try their wings at doing some nutrition training,'" she said. "It would be a win-win situation for both the students and the kids."

The 53 dietetics students were each in charge of preparing a 15- to 20-minute presentation for one of the area's five Boys and Girls Club sites. Program ideas included sanitation, table setting, table manners and food preparation.

Some of the students found creative ways to present their information to the children.

"One of the more popular presentations was a take-off of 'Men in Black,'" Canter said. "The younger kids really seemed to enjoy that one."

Carolyn Andres, junior in dietetics, was one of the students involved in the Kids' Cafe. She said she presented a program to teach the children how to make milkshakes.

"The kids really enjoyed participating and making the food," she said. "And, of course, they got to eat what they made."

Mike Otto, executive director of the Boys and Girls Club of Manhattan, said he also saw the program as fun and beneficial.

"Our outcomes have been phenomenal," he said.

Otto said the combination of the food and the education has kept the children extremely interested.

"With the Kids' Cafe, we are teaching lessons far and beyond cooking and baking. The kids are learning math, nutrition and an understanding of the culinary arts."

Because of the program's overwhelming popularity with the children at the Boys and Girls Club, Otto said he hopes to keep the program running. Because of the new semester, the dietetics class isn't being taught by Canter, and the Kids' Cafe will depend solely on volunteers.

"There is a great need for volunteers," Otto said. "We are interested in any students. They don't just have to be dietetics majors."

Safety Awareness Street Smart Youth class addresses self defense, emergency calls, neighborhood problems

JOHN STOUTS
Kansas State Collegian

Parents can tell their children, "Don't talk to strangers," but it can be hard for young children to determine who is, and isn't, a stranger.

To help children protect themselves, UFM is offering SASSY, the Safety Awareness Street Smart Youth class, this semester.

SASSY is a class designed to help children be safe and aware of the dangers that surround them. UFM Education Coordinator Charlene Brownson said the class is good for children to take because it might help protect them.

"One of the drills that goes on during the class is having an elderly woman to try to get one of the children to leave with them," she said. "The child does not know the woman, and the class teaches them that even if it does seem like a nice person who could be their grandma, that they just can't go with them."

SASSY is a one-night, two-hour course taught by Diana Tarver. Tarver has 15 years experience in taekwon do and has taught women's self-defense courses for more than 10 years. She has taught SASSY for four years.

Tarver said the SASSY class teaches children awareness similar to other programs, but those programs aren't always frequent enough.

"This is the only class of this kind in this area. The police may take an hour out of their day to visit schools and teach some of what we do, but that doesn't happen very often," she said.

The class teaches children how to use the telephone to call 911, to memorize their own addresses and phone numbers, and teaches them self-defense. It also stresses to the children that the self-defense lessons learned are strictly for that purpose and not to beat up on other children at school.

"It is scary the number of children who don't know their own phone number or address," Tarver said. "We have them memorize that and make sure that they learn how to call 911 in case of an emergency."

She added that during the self-defense part of the class, the children learn where their targets are and what their weapons are. Then the children practice on pads and try to perfect the punches and kicks they learn.

"The kids have a lot of fun during the class and really enjoy getting to try out the self-defense mechanisms," Tarver said.

Many parents go over safety with their children, but the children might not understand what is actually being said to them, Brownson said.

"Children just don't understand how important their safety is," she said. "Parents also may not realize that their child doesn't understand and don't know how to get them to understand the things that we are teaching them."

First Clancy destroys Vikings in novel, now he decides he wants to buy them

MINNEAPOLIS, Minn. — In one of his novels, Tom Clancy got the Minnesota Vikings to the Super Bowl and then destroyed them with a nuclear weapon. The best-selling author hopes to write a different ending to the Vikings' next Super Bowl trip now that the owners have accepted his bid to buy the team. Clancy's NFL-record offer of slightly more than $200 million all but ended one of the league's most unusual ownership structures and allowed Clancy to fulfill a longtime ambition of buying an NFL team. “Of course I’m excited,” Clancy said from his home in Baltimore, moments after learning his offer was accepted Tuesday morning. “This has been a dream of mine for a long time.”

Security measures tight at Tokyo airport after homemade rocket injures worker

NAGANO, Japan — Tight security was stepped up further today at the Olympics and at Tokyo's airport, where a rocket attack two days ago injured one worker and raised safety concerns for the Winter Games. The attack Monday night came as thousands of foreign athletes, officials and spectators are streaming through Tokyo's Narita International Airport on their way to the Olympics, which start on Saturday. Police have no evidence the launch of the homemade rockets was aimed at disrupting the flow of people to Nagano, airport spokesman Fujio Takahashi said Tuesday.

And while no one has claimed responsibility for the attack at the airport 40 miles east of Tokyo, authorities suspect it was carried out by leftist radicals who have long opposed the building of a second runway there. Radicals frequently have claimed responsibility for similar attacks in the past — although this is the first one to result in an injury.

Asata Hara, director of security operations for the Nagano Olympic Organizing Committee, said stricter checks at Olympic venues would be instituted. “NAOC will increase the security measures further in order to secure a safe Nagano Olympic Winter Games,” Hara said. “NAOC is consulting with police authorities to strengthen anti-terrorism measures and to prevent such a dangerous incident.”

Donahue interviews with Cowboys' Jones, leaves Dallas without coaching job offer

IRVING, Texas — Terry Donahue returned to California on Tuesday after another round of interviews and a night at owner Jerry Jones' mansion, creating an uncertain turn in the Dallas Cowboys' search for a new coach.

The former UCLA coach had a third meeting with Jones before catching an early-morning flight home, heightening speculation that things did not go well.

Still, only Jones, sons Stephen and Jerry Jr., and Donahue know for sure. And the latest developments leave the Cowboys into a fourth week as they try to find a successor to Barry Switzer.

Jones, who hired Jimmy Johnson and Switzer although they had no NFL coaching experience, did not return calls. He had said a new coach would be hired by mid-week, but whatever happened with Donahue seemed to rule out an imminent decision.

“There is no timetable estimate for the near future. I’m not at liberty to say whether there will be more interviews,” team spokesman Rich Dalrymple said.

Trade offers for Johnson unacceptable, ace might spend all of 1998 with Seattle

SEATTLE — Seattle hasn't heard an acceptable offer for Randy Johnson, so it appears he will stay with the Mariners until at least the July 31 trade deadline.

“If he's with us at the beginning and the end, that means we're right there fighting to get in postseason play,” general manager Woody Woodward said Tuesday.

Johnson is eligible for free agency after the season, and Seattle said Nov. 12 it wouldn't offer a contract extension. Johnson, who will make $6 million this season, asked to be traded. The Mariners said they were approached by six teams, including the New York Yankees, Cleveland, Toronto and Los Angeles.

“I really thought there would be more clubs calling,” Woodward said. “I didn't think there would be so many clubs hesitating because of dollars and that's what I've seen over the last couple of months.”

If Seattle has a chance to repeat as AL West champion, it's likely the 34-year-old left-hander will spend the entire season with the Mariners.

“Our posture basically is to win,” manager Lou Piniella said. “So we're pleased that Randy's still with us. I feel he'll be with us all year.”

Woodward said he expects Johnson to report when spring training opens Feb. 15 at Peoria, Ariz.

Suter suspended 4 games for Kariya hit

NEW YORK — Chicago Blackhawks defenseman Gary Suter was suspended for four games without pay and fined $1,000 Tuesday by the NHL for cross-checking Anaheim forward Paul Kariya in a Sunday game.

Kariya suffered a concussion as a result of the hit and hasn't played or practiced since. No penalty was assessed on the play, which occurred early in the second period after Kariya scored his second goal of the game.

“Mr. Suter delivered a dangerous cross-check to the head of Mr. Kariya, who was in the process of shooting the puck into the Chicago goal and was not in a position to defend himself,” NHL senior vice president and director of hockey operations Brian Burke said in a statement. “Players must be aware that such reckless use of the stick will not be tolerated.”

On this date:

1969 — The 24 major league owners unanimously select Bowie Kuhn as commissioner for a one-year term at a salary of $100,000.

1976 — U.S. District Court Judge John W. Oliver upholds the ruling of arbitrator Peter Seitz that declared Andy Messersmith and Dave McNally free agents.

1987 — Stars & Stripes sweeps Kookaburra III 4-0 at Fremantle, Australia, to bring the America's Cup back to the United States.

1988 — Wes Unseld, Clyde Lovellette, Oregon State coach Ralph Miller and Bobby McDermott are voted to the Basketball Hall of Fame. Unseld is elected in his first year of eligibility.

Freshman Brandy Harris has done plenty to help the Cats this season, but a technical foul proved to be costly Saturday.

K-STATE'S BRANDY HARRIS DRIVES AROUND SHELLEY GARCIA OF COLORADO ON SATURDAY AT THE COORS EVENTS CENTER IN BOULDER, COLO. HARRIS FOULED OUT, AND THEN WAS CHARGED WITH A TECHNICAL FOUL ON TOP OF THE FIVE.

SAM FELSENFELD
Kansas State Collegian

In any given basketball game, the possibility exists that the outcome can be determined by the bounce of the ball. And often enough, it happens.

For K-State's women's basketball team, it happened on Saturday at Colorado.

However, the bad bounce for the Wildcats didn't come on a clutch play during the final few seconds of the 56-52 loss to the Buffaloes.

It came with 6:40 left in the second half — and the ball was dead.

With the Cats leading 42-38, freshman Brandy Harris committed her disqualifying fifth personal foul, then slammed the ball when she heard the whistle.

“I was just frustrated,” she said. “It's something I shouldn't have done.”

Apparently, the officials agreed she shouldn't have done that.

Harris was assessed a technical foul, and Colorado's LaShena Graham made the most of the situation. Graham sank two free throws for the personal foul, bringing the Buffs to within two.

She made the first free throw for the technical, and although she missed the second, Colorado clearly gained the momentum that had belonged to the Cats for most of the game.

Watching Graham cut into K-State's lead was especially difficult for Harris. Harris, despite fouling out with nearly seven minutes to play, led the Cats in scoring Saturday and was forced to watch the Buffs knock down the lead she helped K-State maintain for more than a half.

“I was really frustrated sitting over there on the bench, watching them make those free throws,” she said.

From there, K-State struggled offensively, and by the time the Cats managed a score, the Buffs had completed a 9-0 run, taking the lead for the first time in nearly 22 minutes.

The Cats never regained the lead.

K-State Coach Deb Patterson said there wasn't a single factor more crucial to the outcome of the game than Harris' technical foul, although the Cats still had a chance after the Buffs' run.

“I did feel that the last six minutes of the game, we continued to compete, possession by possession, and I think that's a great positive for this team,” Patterson said. “They could have packed it in but they stuck with it. That's really, really good for this team.”

Something else that's good for the team is the basketball education freshman Harris received Saturday, learning firsthand that next time she'll be better off gently handing the ball over to the referee.

“It was just a dumb mistake,” Harris said. “It won't happen again.”

THE LAST SIX MINUTES OF THE GAME, WE CONTINUED TO COMPETE, POSSESSION BY POSSESSION, AND I THINK THAT'S A GREAT POSITIVE FOR THIS TEAM.

Cats, Sooners square off to break 7th-place tie

JILL JARSULIC/Collegian
COLORADO'S DAMIETTA VELICIA AND K-STATE'S BRIT JACOBSON BATTLE FOR A LOOSE BALL SATURDAY.

► CATS LOST 1ST GAME, BUT SOONERS HAVE NO BIG 12 ROAD WINS.

SUN DEI MILLS
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State and Oklahoma women's basketball teams meeting each other tonight in Bramlage Coliseum share many common characteristics.

The teams are tied for seventh in the Big 12 Conference. Both teams have above .500 records on their home courts. Neither team has attained a Big 12 road win.

So, which team is better?

“I'm really not sure if we should win or if they should win,” K-State coach Deb Patterson said. “You'd like to think you're better than your opponent, but in this case, are we?”

Last season, there was no question. After pulling out a 49-47 win at Norman, Okla., the Cats went on to soundly defeat the Sooners 81-56 in the first round of the Big 12 Tournament.

Sooner coach Sherri Coale is in her second season at Oklahoma and Patterson said she thinks Coale's team is going in the right direction.

“Oklahoma is kind of maturing right now,” Patterson said. “They're more confident in what they can do on the offensive end of the floor. Their program is at a level where they're starting to think it might work.”

The Sooners don't suffer the short bench problem that K-State is dealing with at this point in the season. While five Cats are averaging 30 minutes or more on the court, only Sooner guard Roxanne Long and forward Phylesha Whaley see the floor as often.

Sooner guard Shonika Breedlove contributes a fair number of minutes, and the three players combine for the majority of Oklahoma's points and rebound numbers.

Whaley, a sophomore, averages 37 minutes, 24 points and eight rebounds a game, and is the type of player who Patterson describes as a little guard in a bigger body.

“She's got spin moves, and she can make plays with her back to the basket,” Patterson said. “She's pretty seasoned for being as young as she is.”

Not an exceptional three-point shooter (2-7 this season), Whaley plays well in the paint while sporting a nice 10- to 12-foot jump shot. Patterson said her unusual style of play will challenge the Cats.

“Her inside-outside game makes her harder to defend,” Patterson said. “That's the dimension you have to be prepared for.”

Defense is a plus and minus for the Cats right now. Patterson said she is pleased with the team's defensive efforts, but for the third game in a row, her team got into foul trouble.

Senior Cat guard Brit Jacobson had her fourth foul early in the second half of the Colorado game Saturday, but wasn't substituted until much later in the half. Jacobson, the Cats' leading scorer, said she hasn't dealt with this problem much before.

“I get the mindset that I'm going to have to stay on the court when I have four fouls, and I'm not going to get that last foul,” she said. “I haven't gotten that many before for as aggressive as I play.”

But Patterson said she is fairly satisfied with her team's position going into February play.

“I would have liked to have gotten one more win in January,” Patterson said. “I think we just have to wait and see where we are and what we can do.”

Tonight's game will be broadcast on KSDB-FM 91.9.

Overzealous weightlifters take themselves a little too seriously

You might not know his name, but you know who he is.

You've never actually talked to him, but you've seen him a million times.

You've seen him because you're one of thousands of K-State students who frequent the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. Not only do you see him there. You can't avoid him.

Stumped? Perhaps a description will refresh your memory.

He's big and buff — a real beefsteak. For some reason, his arms don't fall to his sides like most people's. Instead, they hang at an angle, as if some magical force field were suspending his elbows at least six inches from his torso. He purses his lips and slowly turns his head from side to side, just in case any of the women on the Stairmasters hadn't yet been granted the privilege of noticing him.

It makes you dizzy just to think about the effort he must have put into his workout routine.

His hair is so meticulously sculpted and full of styling gel that he couldn't crack it mold even if he accidentally dropped a 70-pound dumbbell on his head. His earring is the perfect complement to his neatly trimmed sideburns. It's the dead of winter, yet somehow he sports a sunburn rivaled only by champion surfers.

He uses two customized outfits to adequately display his svelte, chiseled physique. One is an old ringer T-shirt that hugs the outline of his body so tight it makes you wonder whether he was in second or third grade the last time it fit. The other, of which he owns several, is a remnant of a No Fear shirt scaled down to one-eighth its original surface area by a pair of scissors.

You want to bow in reverence as he loads six 45-pound plates onto a bench press bar for his first set of the night. You'd kill to have him ask you for a spot. Once he's sure everyone is watching, he begins his pre-set ritual of concentrated breathing and exotic facial contortions.

Finally, he's ready. He lowers the bar to his chest, then pushes with every ounce of anabolic energy. His face now beet-red, you fully expect the blood vessel in his forehead to burst at any moment. One prolonged grunt from his mouth, and you no longer wonder where Steven Spielberg got the sound effects for the tyrannosaurus in “Jurassic Park.”

Immediately afterward, the wall of mirrors beckons him to bask in the glory of a job well done. Leaving behind a pool of sweat, he admires his own reflection as he flexes for the world. The whole experience is so euphoric you forget it's been 30 minutes since he first staked his claim on the bench-press unit.

He might be just one person, but there are several like him. He's one member of an elite breed of weight room heroes who grace the Rec Complex with their presence every day.

You know who he is.

K-State students enjoy probably the finest recreation facilities available to any general student body in the Big 12. As many as 3,000 students pass through its turnstiles on a given day. Most go to play and watch sports, exercise their hearts, lose weight and build their muscles.

Others treat the Rec Complex as a social gathering place where they need to make an appearance, much like a bar or a party. They seem intent on demonstrating strength rather than developing it. They bang their weights together at the top of each repetition and then slam them down on the floor, too cool to even think about placing them back on the rack.

They plan their attire more thoughtfully for one hour of lifting than most people do before a wedding or a job interview. They wear shirts that expose their nipples. They pay homage to themselves in the mirror. They shamelessly ogle every passing female. They give the Rec Complex all the charm and ambience of a meat market.

Maybe the person described above sounds familiar after all. Maybe he sounds too familiar.

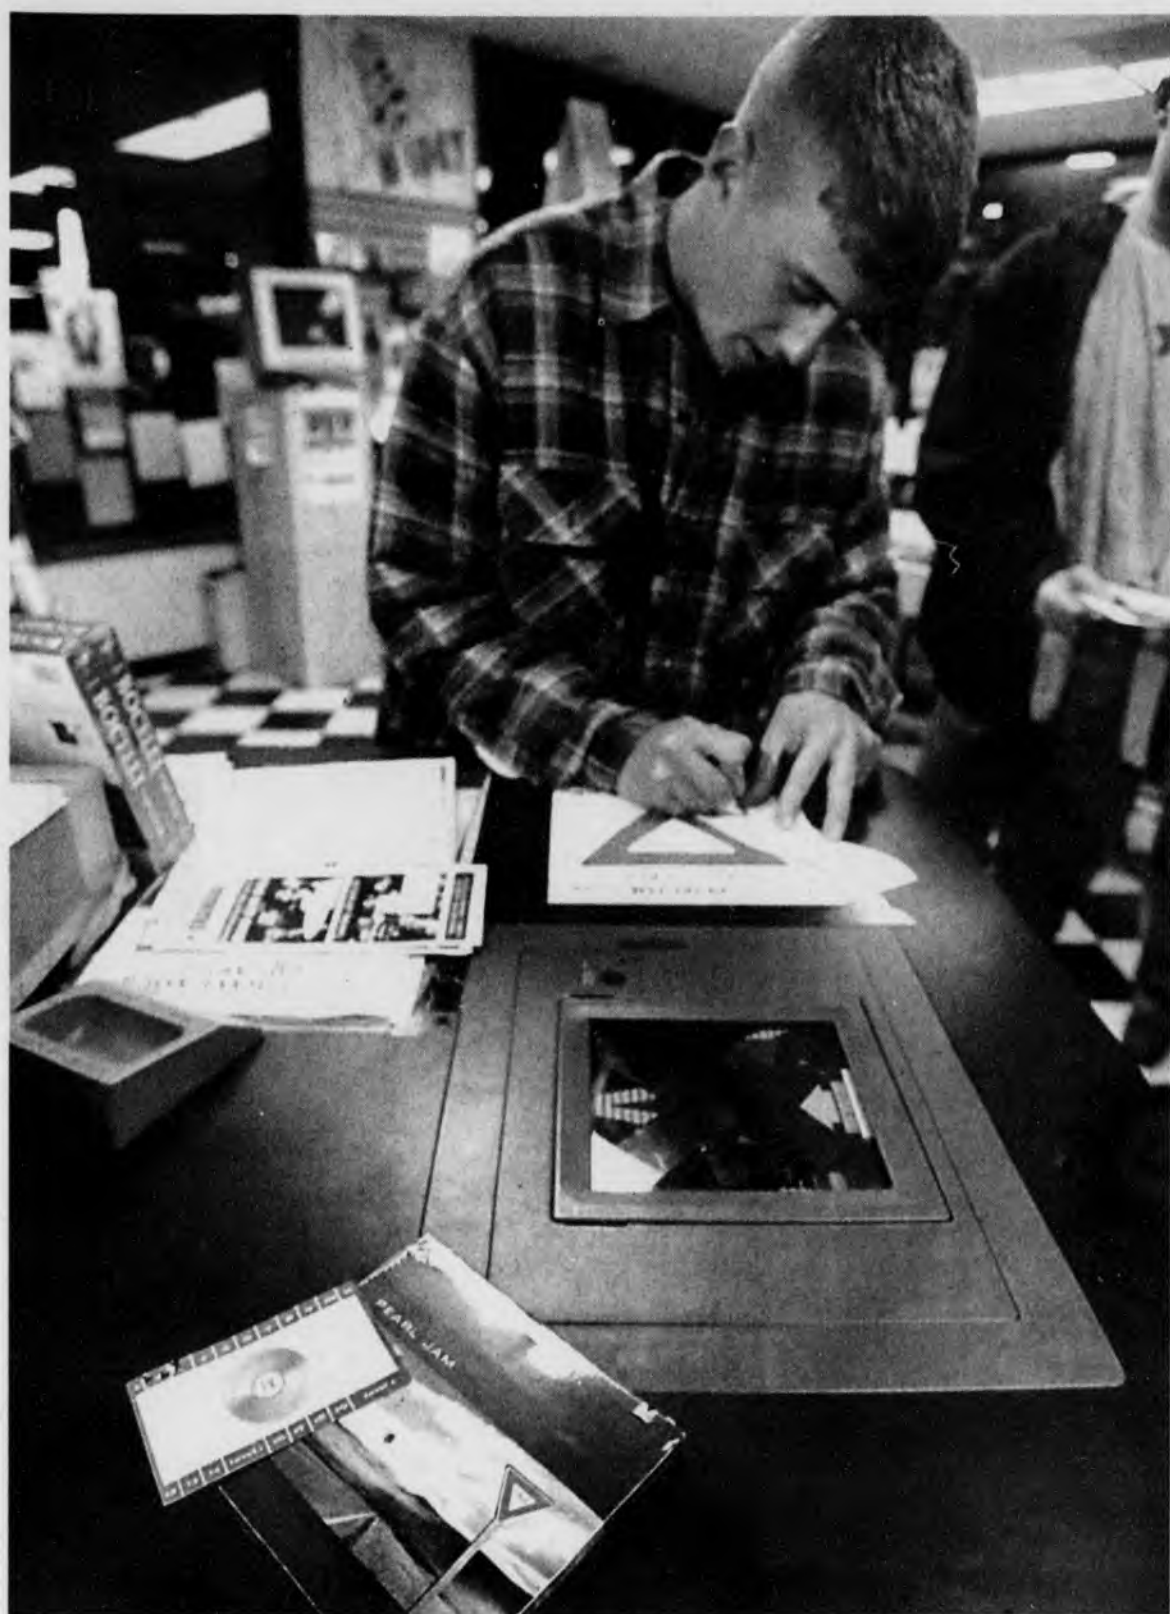

Maybe you have talked to him. Maybe you know his name. And although you'd never admit it, just maybe he's you.

AARON HOFER, FROM FORT RILEY, SIGNS A CREDIT SLIP WHILE BUYING THE NEW PEARL JAM COMPACT DISC AT STREETSIDE RECORDS ON MONDAY NIGHT.

YIELD TO DEMAND

Fans line up for midnight release of new Pearl Jam album

DIANA LEE
Kansas State Collegian

Lining up outside Streetside Records in the middle of the night might sound like an odd adventure, but for die-hard music fans, it is merely a small part of a quest to get their favorite band's new album first.

Monday night, Streetside Records, along with KMKF-FM 101.5 and Pizza Hut, sponsored a compact disc listening party in celebration of Pearl Jam's new album, "Yield," which was released Tuesday.

"People have been waiting for an album like this for over four years. It has more of an even, flowing sound that makes you want to pass people through the crowd," Eileen Meyer, manager of Streetside Records, said. "I am not the barometer of what is good, but I think fans will be more pleased with this album."

"They stood in line for 'Vitalogy,' 'Vs.' and 'No Code,' and the lines got progressively smaller. If the last album was 'Ten,' I think we would be dealing with between 300 and 500 album sales, but I think we are dealing with a more cautious audience."

Events similar to the Pearl Jam listening party have been organized in the past for Garth Brooks, Metallica, Tupac Shakur and Led Zeppelin. There also have been crowds lined up for albums by Blues Traveler, Nirvana, Hum, Ben Folds Five and Celine Dion.

"I wanted to get it here because I knew it would be a cheaper price for the album, and the whole promotion seemed fun, like there would be a chance to win something," Fili Sanchez, senior in horticulture, said. Streetside is open late every Monday night for the music fans who can't make it in any other time.

"These fans have been waiting so long that every minute counts. It's like lining up to get concert tickets. The people you stand in line with will be the people you sit by at the concert. Then you look back and say 'Remember when we stood in line to get that CD?' It's a lot of fun," Meyer said.

These events also give fans a time to gather and celebrate their love for their favorite bands, Meyer said.

"It gives people a chance to come out of their niches to be with people like themselves," she said.

FBI investigates letters surrounding clinic bombing

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. — The FBI said Monday it is investigating letters claiming the fatal bombing at a Birmingham abortion clinic was orchestrated by the "Army of God," the same group that said it bombed an abortion clinic and gay nightclub in Atlanta last year.

FBI spokesman Craig Dahle said the letters sent to media outlets were signed by the "Army of God" and handwritten with block print — similar to ones sent after the Atlanta bombings.

FBI spokeswoman Celestine Armstead confirmed that copies of the letter had been sent to the Atlanta Journal-Constitution and to Reuters news agency. Atlanta's WAGA-TV, a Fox affiliate, said it also had received a copy.

The FBI would not say if the letters were intercepted before they were delivered.

The Journal-Constitution reported in Tuesday editions that the letters were postmarked from Birmingham on Thursday afternoon, just hours after the blast.

In addition to the similar style of block lettering, the letters sent last week and the ones sent last year all proclaimed "Death to the new world order," the paper said.

The Birmingham letter issued a warning to "those who work in the murder mills around the nation" that they "will be targeted without quarter — you are not immune from retaliation — your commissar's (sic) in Washington can't protect you!"

The writer also said anyone who makes, markets, sells or distributes the abortion pill RU-486 will be a target of the Army of God.

Dahle said it is too soon to say anything now about the authenticity of the letters.

The Army of God is a name that has been circulating since the 1980s as a force for radical pro-life actions, including circulating a manual that contains information on how to make bombs.

It's not clear who makes up the organization, although various pro-life activists have either been linked to it or claimed to be part of it over the years.

The letters from last year claimed responsibility for the abortion clinic and club bombings in Atlanta, but not the Olympic Park explosion in 1996.

Kathy Spillar, national coordinator for the Feminist Majority Foundation, said the letters from the Army of God must be taken very seriously. She said the letters after the Atlanta clinic bombing warned that "the next facility targeted may not be empty. Clearly that is what happened in Birmingham."

Board to discuss publications director's employment

contract is controlled by the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications.

Simon said the board's role is an advisory one. Johnson can't be dismissed until his contract comes up for yearly review by the journalism school's tenured faculty.

Bill Feyerharm, assistant to the dean of the College of Arts and Sciences and also a board member, agreed.

"It can be discussed, but the board is not in a position to fire him," he said. "The contract dictates that."

Both Eckert and Getz said other students, not just board members, have played a role in bringing the issue of Johnson's employment to the forefront.

Student Body President Tim Riemann also has been involved.

Three members of the Board of Student Publications must notify the chairman if they wish to have a special meeting. Eckert said Riemann gave him a letter calling for the meeting at last week's Student Senate meeting.

"I was given a letter and asked to sign it so I was like, 'Sure, we'll have a meeting,'" Eckert said. He said Riemann gave him the letter.

Getz said Riemann also gave him the letter at the same Senate meeting.

"I think he got it from Jason Ellis, and he had it at the Senate meeting because he knew Gabe Eckert and I would be there."

Riemann on Tuesday would not comment about his involvement.

"With regard to personnel issues that are related to Student Publications and not student government, I have absolutely no comment," Riemann said.

Truax said he wasn't aware of any direct attempt by Student Governing Association members to call for Johnson's dismissal.

"Not directly," he said, when asked if he knew of such a plan. "There's hearsay about it, but I don't know."

When asked if he knew about or participated in extortion (threatening Board of Student Publications members with a cut in their privilege fee unless Johnson was fired), Truax wouldn't respond.

"I'd better not answer that one," he said.

On a follow-up question, Truax was asked if he supported extortion tactics. "I can't answer that," he said.

Moments later, Truax answered the question.

"I don't support extortion or its tactics. Obviously, that's against the law," he said. "But you have to find the definition of extortion and see if it's applicable to whatever situation you're implying."

But Truax said if Privilege Fee Committee members wanted to take action against Johnson, their only recourse would be to cut the amount of his salary from the Student Publications privilege fee.

"In the review process... my understanding isn't that Privilege Fee Committee would necessarily terminate his position, but the only thing they could do, subject to Student Senate approval, is just take out that portion of the budget," he said.

Johnson said he hoped students wouldn't consider taking that sort of action.

"If some student government leaders are going to withhold a very important student service over this type of matter, that would be very unfortunate," he said. "Ultimately, the entire student body of K-State would suffer from that."

"ROBOTIC PORTRAITURE," A SHOW OF WORK BY ARTIST DEENA DES RIOUX, IS IN THE UNION ART GALLERY UNTIL FRIDAY. GALLERY HOURS ARE FROM 8 A.M. TO 5 P.M. MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY. IVAN KOZAR Collegian

Computer art misses reflections, details

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

The "Bill Gateses" of the world might think computers and endless amounts of technology are solving society's ills, but some artists have questioned this direction.

Although there are many artists who have embraced technology, some even on this campus, others are not so sure and have become encumbered with identity issues, that favorite buzzword of the sensitive 1990s.

At least New York artist Deena des Rioux has attempted to pose some questions about this dilemma with digital portraiture that fuses both human and technological stock parts into a post-punk idiom. Her work is in the Union art gallery until Friday.

Without the added edge of technological images, this portraiture lacks interest (most of the models look like Sinead O'Connor or Grace Jones). The work's formal capacities are quite limited. The digitally produced work is reduced to that of magazine illustration.

Open up this month's issue of PC Magazine or Wired and you're likely to find so-called cyber-images that are either at the same level or better than des Rioux's art. (A comment on the gallery guest book even suggests "Wired magazine rejects.")

In a work like "Gate Array," digital duraflex photo (1989), the pointlessness of the work is sloppily countered with an off-axis tilt of the portrait at a 30-degree angle. This simple formalistic approach fails at infusing the work with even slight tension. Countless other examples of the artist's work exhibit this same device.

There is little sumptuousness in digital art, especially when it is not used to its greatest potential. Surfaces are flat and glossy, lines are expressionless. It's ironic if des Rioux means to suggest the art is machine-made, a product of computer chips and systems logic, because the images are des Rioux's imagination and her work alone produced them.

Using a machine, in this case a computer, to produce art does not necessarily qualify the product as machine-made. It's the irony of Fritz Lang's "Metropolis," a Kaleidoscope film this week, where machines supposedly make life easier, however the machines are powered by endless numbers of ill-treated workers.

But there are advantages to digital work, especially evident in some of des Rioux's morphing of human images with technology stage props. Missing, however, are the subtlety of reflections and detail that bring digital art to life.

The one piece that approaches something with more than one-dimensional meaning is "Systems Interface," digital duraflex photo (1992). In this work, des Rioux has meshed past and present as if asking what has become of society. A rather 19th-century looking character in bow tie, conservative suit and leather gloves, with head cocked back, looks through round spectacles with hard drives in place for eyes.

The gender ambiguity and references to the past suggest both the passage of time and the confusion the new electronic world has brought to our lives. The cross-cultural references in other work, particularly "Kabuki Circuit," digital duraflex photo (1989), which borrows superficially from traditional Kabuki theater costume and makeup while fusing it into a circuit board of sorts, represent the very worst of post-modern thought.

When this is the most one can grasp from such synthetic, machine-quality work, one begins to feel sorrier for the computer as used by artist than the society used by computer.

Newest Coalesce release pounds out hardcore sounds

PHIL KELLUM
Kansas State Collegian

The quantum physics of hardcore. That's how Kansas City, Mo., hardcore band Coalesce describes itself. I couldn't think of a more apt description if I tried.

Coalesce's new album, "Give Them Rope," is an exercise in true brutality. Listening to this compact disc is much like being beaten with a baseball bat covered in barbed wire. Absolute brutality with a capital B.

The CD opens with "Have Patience," a track that starts off instantly. These boys don't mess around with long intros — they just pound you into submission in a hurry. It's a heavy, crushing song with bizarre tempos and rhythms that are anything but standard time. It's got enough tempo changes to make you dizzy and is a great way to start the album.

"One On The Ground" starts off pounding at your skull like a jackhammer until you give in. Every song has vocalist Sean Ingram's throat-shredding vocals, but this song is especially harsh. The lyrics are very metaphorical but seem to be about child abuse.

The best song on the CD has to be "Cut To Length." It's a blistering song that speaks out against rape and violence towards women with brutal, honest lyrics like, "Still you would let these bastards live and damn those whores for carelessness. Come with your legislation. Cut the length and give them rope. I'll whet the appetite for change."

"Still It Sells" is a slower song than I'm used to from Coalesce, but it's still as heavy as the rest. The breakdown is awesome, with guitarist Jes Steineger throwing out some killer riffs. The song fades out and then pops back up unexpectedly for some reason. I don't know if it's a pressing flaw or what.

"I Am Not The First" is an interesting, short instrumental with cool machine-like loops that blend into the next song, "This Is Not The Last."

"This Is Not The Last" seems to be about abusive relationships, specifically between father and son. It features a killer bridge with numbing tempo changes. The song disintegrates at the end into nothing.

"I Took A Year" is a perfect song to end the album. It's incredibly fast with even more tempo changes. It's an evil-sounding dirge with incredible guitar work courtesy of Steineger and drums from James DeWees. I especially like the stop-start toward the end.

By the time this 11-song, 40-minute album was over, I found myself hitting the repeat button on my CD player to hear it again. It's a great record for anyone into hardcore or metal, especially bands like Kiss It Goodbye, Deadguy, Bloodlet and Today Is The Day.

I give it a four out of five star rating. Almost perfect. A must-own.

Businesses receive help from development center

AMY MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

Fred Rice said people have walked into the Small Business Development Center with crazy ideas before.

But Rice, director of the center, said these ideas can become dreams, which can become business realities.

"We see something new every day," he said.

Rice said the center helps these people slow down and do their homework. The center helps potential business owners write a business plan and work a cash-flow worksheet, two things they might not have thought about, Rice said.

"Some people think, 'I'm just going to buy stuff and sell it,' and they get a rude awakening," he said.

The center offers 15 to 18 entrepreneurship classes each year, including a class on Internet business. The Net provides a niche in the world marketplace, but is not appropriate for all businesses, Rice said.

Rice said he considers locally owned Agtech an example of a business with a Net-friendly niche. The owners of Agtech, which distributes veterinary embryo-transfer supplies, needed to distribute a catalog to people across the country, so the Net was the ideal vehicle, Rice said.

Rice said the classes offer perspectives on different job opportunities than what students learn in K-State business classes. While the university's classes focus on working for large corporations, classes at the center teach students how to start a business.

Rice said he considers Manhattan Check Service one of the center's success stories.

Owner Brad Harper said he first came to the center in 1992 because he wanted to learn the process involved in purchasing the check service, where he was an employee. He said he took an entrepreneurship class and was impressed by the center's wide variety of business experience.

"They've dealt with a lot of people and situations," he said.

He regularly comes back to the center, about every six months, when he needs guidance on issues such as a new lease, taxes or accounting, he said.

"It's a safety net to fall back on," he said.

SLAVE LIFE

K-State professor explores female identity in speech class

BRENNIA TALLEY
Kansas State Collegian

Olga Davis is teaching slave narratives for the first time as part of a K-State class.

Davis teaches history, race, gender and the creative individual in her class, Rhetoric of the Black Female Slave. This speech class was created from her doctoral dissertation to help women who did not find a place in history with which they could identify.

"While slave narratives have been around since the 1800s, I wanted to look at it from a communication point of view," Davis said.

She said persuasive narratives help students make general conclusions. Students later analyze and discuss these conclusions to help them better understand the narratives.

Guy Cognet, senior in social sciences, said he is taking the class to get a better understanding of who he is and where he belongs as a multiracial person.

"Far too often the black female slave voices are never heard. Those are the voices I want to hear," he said.

Cognet said the class is not only important for black students, but for all students.

Davis said all students can benefit from taking the course, no matter what they study at K-State.

Required readings for the class are views from female slaves such as Harriet Jacobs, Mary Prince and Mattie J. Jackson. These experiences include the consequences of the women knowing how to read and write, Davis said.

In class, the students recall the good and bad things they heard about female slaves. Cognet said he remembers incorrectly hearing they were domestic, happy beings.

In contrast, Danielle Teen, senior in pre-law, said she had always heard about the beatings and poor treatment of slave women and children.

The writings are used to create an identity for the female slave, and Davis said that through the power of the narratives, the women's voices can finally be heard.

"One uses language to resist oppressive sources of domination," Davis said. "You could say the pen, or discourse, is mightier than the sword. Nab your opponent not only with fists, but with language."

An important part of the class requires students to apply their understanding of a female slave's perspective and also to place themselves in the 19th century in their own narrative, Davis said.

Previously, these creative narratives have been fabulous, Davis said. She said it is telling what a person, whether it is a slave owner, mistress, onlooker or abolitionist, thought about slavery.

For now, Davis said the class will explore why female slaves wrote at all.

"They just wanted to get to freedom and get out of wherever they were," she said.

K-State students to compete in tractor-pull competition

AMY EBERT
Kansas State Collegian

The Powercat Pullers, a team of K-State students, will design and build a quarter-sized tractor to compete in a pulling contest in May.

Students will build the tractor with the standard engine and two tires given to it by the sponsors of the event, the Society for Engineering in Agriculture, Food and Biological Systems.

"The object of the competition is to build the most efficient machine with the given engine and tires and remain within the weight regulations," said Mark Schrock, professor of biological and agricultural engineering and team adviser.

Schrock advises the team along with Edwin Eisele, graduate student in biological and agricultural engineering.

Students on the team are divided into five groups, and each group is assigned to complete a different component of the tractor, Schrock said. One group is assigned to record the process of building a tractor.

"They are not just building a tractor, they are documenting what was done and developing a report for the competition," he said.

Another responsibility of team members is to raise the money necessary to buy and make all the other parts of the tractor.

"We have raised about $2,200 so far from local equipment dealers, professors and other agriculture-oriented businesses," said team member Rodney Heinen, senior in agricultural technology management.

The team's goal is to raise $5,000.

"Since this is the first time for this tractor event, developing a base of sponsors will take time, but it's going to happen," said James Koelliker, professor and department head of biological and agricultural engineering.

The contest gives the 18 students the chance to get involved in a hands-on project, Koelliker said.

"It's an exciting opportunity for students who are more application-oriented than design-oriented to get a chance to participate in such a contest," he said.

Koelliker said K-State has a long history of success in design competitions like the tractor contest.

"We have a lot of enthusiasm for the competition, and I am anxious to see us compete well and gain some good experience," he said.

Even though raising enough money and completing the tractor on time are challenges, Schrock said the team is excited about the competition.

"It is going to be a challenge to get it all done by the end of the semester, but they are all organized and making progress right now," he said.

Members of the team will receive three hours of credit for their work. There is a coordinating session each week, and the students work in their teams on their own time, Schrock said.

"They are expected to do quite a bit of their own work on their own time to get it done on time," Schrock said.

Ombudsperson Program offers advice for county extension faculty

AMY EBERT
Kansas State Collegian

Concerns and suggestions now have a place to go within K-State Research and Extension.

The Ombudsperson Program provides confidential and anonymous consultation to any of the 265 county extension faculty across the state. The purpose of the program is to provide an alternative route to solving work-related problems.

"If a faculty member has a work-related situation in which they feel wronged or concerned about, the ombudsperson is someone they can go to as a listening ear or sounding board," said Stacey Warner, leader of extension operations for K-State Research and Extension.

The university has its own Ombudsperson Program, but the research and extension program is specific to the needs of county office personnel. The Ombudsperson Program based at K-State is not available to the county workers, even though they are K-State faculty.

"The program is definitely needed because the county workers didn't have a place to go. I have had a number of my fellow agents call seeking information, so I think the program is working," said Ombudsperson Ann Domsch, 4-H and youth extension specialist in the southeast area office.

Another ombudsperson, Carol Shanklin, professor of hotel, restaurant, institution management and dietetics, said she agrees the program is an important part of the research and extension division.

"The program is very important because it shows there is support at the administrative level, that there is a source for resolution," she said.

The types of concerns discussed with ombudspersons include employment issues such as salary and performance reviews, and other problems such as discrimination and interpersonal office conflicts.

The program is only an alternative, and employment-related concerns should first be addressed with supervisors, Warner said.

"When they have a problem, they need to address it at the base level first. If that approach doesn't work, then they can use the ombudsperson service," Warner said.

The 12 ombudspersons available to all the K-State Research and Extension faculty are chosen through a peer-nomination process. The work done by the ombudspersons is voluntary and sometimes time consuming, Warner said.

"Serving in the capacity of an ombudis volunteer. They do this in addition to their full-time responsibilities, which helps them relate to the research and extension work," she said.

The role of an ombudsperson is to listen to faculty concerns and provide sources to help solve the conflict. They are not mediators or problem solvers, Warner said.

"Their role is not as an advocate, but as a listener. They are to provide adequate questions and assistance on matters and then help determine options for the situation," she said.

Student Publications board terminates director's office

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
Kansas State Collegian

At a 7 a.m. special meeting of the Board of Student Publications on Wednesday, members voted 6-4 to declare vacant the office of director of Student Publications Inc.

The move puts Director Ron Johnson's employment status in question, because his contract is actually controlled by the College of Arts and Sciences, not the board.

Student Publications publishes the Collegian, Royal Purple yearbook and Campus Directory. Though the corporation is partially funded by student fees, it operates independently from the university and is controlled by an 11-member board of directors.

Even board members who voted for Wednesday's motion said they are confused about what effects it might have on Johnson's employment status.

Board Chairman Todd Simon, also director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications, said the board didn't consider what immediate effects its motion would have.

"The board didn't really discuss the effects of this motion," he said. "Legal implications? Yes, we discussed those. But the practical effects of the motion? No."

Board members Barry Flinchbaugh, who made the initial motion, and Jason Ellis, who voted for it, refused to comment on Wednesday's meeting.

When Johnson was hired as director, his contract was written and signed by the dean of the College of Arts and Sciences. Johnson spends half of his days as Student Publications director but is employed by the university as a half-time instructor.

Johnson, who has served as director for nine years, said his situation now is a curious one. Though the board has declared his position vacant, Johnson said he is still covered by a university contract that employs him as director.

"I'm in the interesting position of being dismissed as director of Student Publications, but I still have a contract that employs me as a full-time employee of KSU and as director of Student Publications," he said.

Some board members said they weren't personally attacking Johnson's performance by voting to declare the position vacant. Instead, they said, the intent was to clarify a vacancy that some believe has existed for years.

Because Johnson's contract is signed by college officials and not by the Board of Student Publications, board members said they hoped to send a message to the university by declaring the position vacant and by refusing to fund the board's $33,249 portion of Johnson's salary.

Dean of Arts and Sciences Peter Nicholls said no matter what the board decided, he must fulfill Johnson's contract.

"I have issued a contract to Ron Johnson and the university is therefore contractually obligated to live up to the terms of that contract and we will do so," he said. "If the Student Publications money suddenly disappears, I guess the college will have to find the rest of that funding."

But Nicholls said Johnson's employment status is unclear. Until legal interpretations can be obtained, he said Johnson should still supervise the day-to-day operations of Student Publications.

"I would recommend that for the immediate future

See STUDENT PUBLICATIONS BOARD, Page 10

THE END RESULT

"Since the Board of Student Publications Inc. is now subsidizing the salary of a Department of Journalism and Mass Communications faculty member — the director of Student Publications — using student fee money and finds itself in the untenable position of having no contractual jurisdiction over the position, the subsidy is hereby withdrawn and the corporate position declared vacant."

THE VOTE: 6-4

YEA: Barry Flinchbaugh, agriculture professor, presidential appointment to the board; Bill Feyerharm, assistant dean of College of Arts and Sciences; Jason Ellis, student at-large member; Carlton Getz, student at-large member; Jay Witt, student at-large member; and Julie Strickland, student at-large member.

NAY: Gabe Eckert, student at-large member; Kevin Klassen, Collegian newsroom representative; Ben Underwood, Collegian advertising representative; Ashley Schmidt, Royal Purple yearbook representative.

*Strickland was not present at the meeting. Barry Flinchbaugh cast a vote as her proxy.

THE RESPONSE

"I'm in the interesting position of being dismissed as director of Student Publications, but I still have a contract that employs me as a full-time employee of KSU and as director of Student Publications." — Ron Johnson, director of Student Publications Inc.

"I think it's safe to say that Ron's performance was the motivating factor to vacate his position because I believe that the contractual concerns could have been solved without that action." — Kevin Klassen, Collegian newsroom representative to the Board of Student Publications

"I only wish if the Board of Student Publications had a problem with his performance, they would've had a chance to review his performance, but that's not what happened." — Peter Nicholls, dean of Arts and Sciences

"I think our first responsibility is to play fair with our employees. Playing fair is having a hearing, doing an inquiry and giving a person accused of poor performance in a particular area a chance to improve that perception." — Todd Simon, chairman of the Board of Student Publications

ABOVE: RON JOHNSON, DIRECTOR OF STUDENT PUBLICATIONS INC., LISTENS TO COMMENTS FROM MEMBERS OF THE UNIVERSITY'S BOARD OF STUDENT PUBLICATIONS JUST AFTER A 6-4 BOARD VOTE TO EFFECTIVELY DISMISS HIM WEDNESDAY MORNING. JOHNSON, WHO IS ALSO NEWS ADVISER FOR THE COLLEGIAN, IS EMBROILED IN A LEGAL BATTLE TO DETERMINE WHETHER HIS CONTRACT WITH THE UNIVERSITY IS STILL VALID AFTER THE DECISION. FIFTEEN TO 20 JOURNALISM STUDENTS, INCLUDING SOPHOMORE JEFF COOPER (LEFT), SENIOR SAM FELSENFELD AND SENIOR TODD STEWART, SHOWED SUPPORT FOR JOHNSON AT THE MEETING WEDNESDAY.

LEFT: TODD SIMON, DIRECTOR OF THE A.Q. MILLER SCHOOL OF JOURNALISM AND MASS COMMUNICATIONS, ALSO SERVES AS CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD OF STUDENT PUBLICATIONS. THOUGH HE OPPOSED A MOTION TO DISMISS RON JOHNSON AS STUDENT PUBLICATIONS DIRECTOR, SIMON COULDN'T VOTE ON THE MOTION AS CHAIRMAN. THE MOTION PASSED 6-4 IN A SPECIAL MEETING OF THE BOARD WEDNESDAY MORNING.

Resources available to clarify financial aid status for students

SARA MARTIN
Kansas State Collegian

Financial aid can cause confusion and worry for K-State students. Unaware of the requirements to keep their aid, some find themselves struggling with classes, but afraid to cut back on the number of hours they take.

"Students don't know if they may or may not need 12 hours," said Bill Feyerharm, associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences and history professor.

"Maybe they're working too much, their courses are going to hell and they sacrifice their grades to keep their aid," he said.

Feyerharm said he often visits with students in similar situations where family, medical or personal problems make it impossible for them to successfully maintain a 12-hour class load.

However, many financial aid recipients don't realize what is expected of their performance and might not need 12 hours a semester, he said.

Both federal and university regulations come into play. "Basically, each student must make academic progress in order to maintain aid," said Larry Moeder, director of the Office of Student Financial Assistance. "There are two ways that this is measured, and to be honest, it gets really complicated."

The first way it is measured is qualitative. Students must maintain a 2.0 grade point average after 60 credit hours are completed. Federal regulations say that if this is not met, students lose future financial assistance.

"The second way is quantitative," Moeder said. "Students must complete an average of nine hours a semester, which is 80 percent of full-time student status."

Moeder said the quantitative part is monitored at the end of each academic year. If for some reason a student needs to drop back to six hours during fall semester, they can complete 12 hours during the spring semester. As long as the student completes 18 hours a year, they fall within the regulations to keep their aid.

However, sometimes situations beyond the control of the student prohibit them from earning 18 hours of credit.

"Some situations don't go away quickly," Moeder said. "Students start having academic difficulty and see they can't meet the 18 hours. I'm always willing to see what can be worked out if that student will come to us about their situation."

Feyerharm said the willingness of the financial aid office to work with students can only lead to positive results.

"If students know that if a legitimate emergency arises and their financial aid won't be dropped, it can really help them to better deal with their situations and keep up their grades," Feyerharm said.

Moeder said the goal of the financial aid office is not to harp about rules and regulations, but to help students.

"My goal is to make it financially possible for students to complete their degree," Moeder said.

Service caps long-distance for 1st year

ALECIA TERRELL
Kansas State Collegian

Students interested in a long-distance service with Southwestern Bell might want to reconsider. A new service called Trims has been constructed to limit monthly bills to $200 for one year.

After the one-year limit is over, customers may resume their service with no restrictions.

"Our main purpose for this new program is assurance that people will pay their bills on time," said Joyce Harrah, representative of the credit and collections office for Southwestern Bell.

Harrah also said billing records have been a key issue with this new phone service.

"Many customers have a problem with paying their bills on time. This service limits them to exceeding a $200 limit for one year. If they do exceed this limit, their long-distance service will be cut off. The only way to get the service turned back on is by paying their bill," she said.

Concerns about this new service have been voiced by customers new to the program.

"We've had our long-distance turned off several times because of this new service," Sheri Bott, Southwestern Bell user, said.

Bott described how angry she was with the company.

Higher education restructuring planned

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The House Select Committee on Higher Education reached consensus Wednesday night on a plan to restructure post-secondary education governance in Kansas.

It would replace the present Board of Regents with a "Council on Higher Education" to supervise the state's six universities, Washburn University, 19 community colleges and 11 vocational and technical schools.

It would retain the present Board of Education to run kindergarten-through-12th grade education.

An entity as yet unnamed and undefined would also be created to serve as a bridge between the new council and the Board of Education for coordination purposes.

The broad outline of the plan was gleaned by Rep. Jim Garner, D-Coffeyville, from suggestions all members of the committee had.

"It keeps us moving forward on developing a final plan," Garner said. "It builds on the ideas everybody had expressed, pulling it together."

Details of the plan remain to be worked out at another meeting of the panel Thursday, but Chairman David Adkins, R-Leawood, planned to take a final vote on the entire proposal Thursday night.

Manhattan High School student dies in sleep; causes unknown until further autopsy reports

A 16-year-old Manhattan girl was found dead in her home Wednesday.

Raina Jones was discovered by her brother Richard Jones Jr. at 5:15 a.m. He went in to wake her up, and she was unresponsive. Lt. Buddy Mays of the Riley County Police Department, said.

Mays said the family called 911. Officers and neighbors tried to give Jones CPR to revive her, but it was too late, he said.

Jones was pronounced dead at Mercy Health Center on College Avenue at about 6:20 a.m., Mays said.

The police do not suspect foul play, drugs or suicide. "There were no signs of violence. Everything was orderly and tidy," Mays said. "It was like she had went to sleep and didn't wake up."

Mays said the coroner ruled the death as natural due to undetermined causes. There will be further tests, but the results will take a while, he said.

Kendra Billam, Manhattan High School cheerleading sponsor, said Jones was a good person.

"She was very bright, upbeat, friendly and sweet. She always had a beautiful smile for everybody. It didn't matter who," Billam said. "She just had that kind of personality. She was very involved with friends and school work."

Billam said it was a hard day at Manhattan High School. "It was really a tough day for everyone, especially for the ones who knew her, but also for the ones who didn't because they saw how upset everyone else was," she said.

Billam said the school was providing counseling for the students.

"There are support groups for the students and places set aside to share grief," she said.

More than a dozen coyote carcasses littered wildlife preserve entrance near Garden City

GARDEN CITY, Kan. — More than a dozen skinned coyotes were left in a pile blocking the entrance to Concanon Wildlife Area, a gesture meant to make a point, a Department of Wildlife and Parks official said Wednesday.

"Maybe we wrote them a ticket, or maybe they don't like a regulation of ours. Whatever their motive, it certainly showed poor judgment," regional supervisor Mark Sexson said.

The carcasses were believed to have been left in the area Monday night, Sexson said.

"Most hunters are responsible about burying the carcasses or leaving them somewhere out of the way for scavengers, but that wasn't the case here," said Sexson, whose staff disposed of the carcasses Wednesday.

Coyotes, whose fur is used for coats and clothing trim, can be hunted in Kansas year-round. The state has an obscure law forbidding the public display of a coyote.

Sexson said that display law and litter laws could be used to prosecute whoever left the carcasses in the road. He said the department's investigators believed they would be able to track down the perpetrators.

"It's just not a good deal to be dumping coyote carcasses out in public view," Sexson said. "We'll track them down, and if nothing else, we'll point out the error in their ways."

University of Nebraska professor sends racist e-mail to students, fellow instructors

LINCOLN, Neb. — A professor who sent e-mail messages containing racial slurs will not be disciplined and cannot be stopped from doing it again, the University of Nebraska-Lincoln chancellor said.

"This is clearly protective of free speech," Chancellor James Moeser said Wednesday. "The Internet was created to help share scholarly work as well as opinions — as is the case here."

David Hibler, an assistant professor of English, sent two questionable messages this week to 300 faculty members, students and others off campus as part of the "Mum Literature" listserv, an e-mail distribution service.

The messages contained numerous references to a racial slur regarding black people and vulgar observations of the President Clinton-Monica Lewinsky controversy.

Hibler has called a news conference for Thursday afternoon to discuss the messages.

The messages were brought to Moeser's attention

Monday by offended faculty members. Moeser said many of those who received the messages have asked that their e-mail addresses be removed from the listserv.

On the floor of the Legislature on Wednesday, Sen. Ernie Chambers of Omaha — the state's only black lawmaker — called for disciplinary action against Hibler. The leader of the UNL black student group, Afrikan Peoples Union, also said Hibler should be punished.

Moeser released a statement on Tuesday criticizing Hibler's actions. Despite his objections, the chancellor said Hibler has a right to express his opinions.

"(Hibler) pretends it is literature," Moeser said. "I condemn the content of his utterances."

Even though the messages were distributed through the university's e-mail system, Moeser refused to comment on whether Hibler's commentary was related to any of his classroom lectures or discussions.

However, Moeser said the university has bylaws that prohibit offensive language in the classroom.

"Obviously there is a limitation to what can be said in the classroom," Moeser said. "It cannot become a hostile and dangerous environment."

WORLDREPORT

Investigation continues in death of Diana; results of airbag deployment included in report

PARIS — The judge investigating the crash that killed Princess Diana is looking into what role, if any, was played by the airbags in the Mercedes she was traveling in, sources close to the investigation said Wednesday.

Judge Herve Stephan's conclusions will be included in the full accident report he is preparing, said the sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The French newspaper Le Parisien, citing a medical report by a trauma specialist at the Pitié-Salpêtrière Hospital where Diana died, claimed Wednesday the airbags might have inflated shortly before the Aug. 31 crash.

Diana, her companion Dodi Fayed and their driver, Henri Paul, all died in the crash in a tunnel along the River Seine. Her bodyguard, Trevor Rees-Jones, was the only survivor.

Le Parisien said Stephan would order a new appraisal into the functioning of the airbags as a result of the medical report. Sources close to the investigation said Wednesday there would not be any new study.

Investigators have focused on Paul's drunken state at the time of the crash, the high speed of the car and the possibility that it struck another automobile before the accident.

Also Wednesday, an Australian couple turned over their Paris vacation video to police after French investigators asked to examine the original for clues to Diana's death.

The video shot outside the Ritz Hotel reportedly shows a white Citroen AX, a car of similar size to the white Fiat Uno that French police suspect might have been involved in the crash.

Investigators say shards from a Fiat Uno tail light were found at the crash scene, but in months of searching have failed to locate the car involved.

FarmHouse to get $1 million facelift

► RENOVATIONS TO BRING FRATERNITY HOUSE UP TO CODE.

JAMI BOYLES
Kansas State Collegian

The FarmHouse fraternity house at K-State will undergo a $1 million renovation this summer.

John Gaither, FarmHouse president and junior in agricultural economics, said the fraternity house is worn down. Nearly the entire building will be renovated, from carpeting to plumbing, including almost every room.

"The house is aging. We've tried our best to take care of it, and we have. Time has just taken its toll," he said.

The changes will not make the house any larger but will change the building's structure.

Renovations in plumbing, electrical wiring and central air will bring the house up to code and improve living conditions in the house, said David Hendricks, FarmHouse vice president and junior in agricultural economics. He said the changes will also make the house handicap-accessible.

Numerous small repairs have been necessary in recent years just to keep the house running, Hendricks said.

"This house has been standing here for a little over 40 years with no structural changes, from lighting to plumbing. It is basically nickeling and diming us to death," he said.

FarmHouse alumni will contribute all of the funding, Gary Mundhenke, chairman of the fund drive and FarmHouse alumnus, said.

The fund-raising effort began in October 1996. Since then about 300

FarmHouse alumni — 27 percent of all FarmHouse alumni — have offered donations, Mundhenke said.

"It was a way for me to give back to the fraternity, what I felt was a huge contribution to myself," he said.

FarmHouse Alumni Association president Jim Blaauw said he made contributions both because of the positive experience it provided when he was in college and because of the necessity of the situation.

"Most of our alumni base had a good experience while in the fraternity. We want to upgrade so that others can have that same experience," he said. "Also, it needs to be done. It has been since the 1950s that any major changes have been done."

The renovations will begin this summer while students are gone and the fraternity house is empty. Construction should be finished by the time school starts in the fall.

Gaither said he thought this would benefit the fraternity.

"This will get a lot more pride in the house. It is something our alumni can be proud of," he said.

Gaither said he felt the renovations would be a great recruitment tool because the fraternity would be an even better place to live.

Hendricks said the fraternity members are looking forward to the changes being made.

"I'm looking forward to the new atmosphere and styling of the house. It will really help us compete," he said.

A fond farewell to K-State

► INSTRUCTOR LEAVES A LEGACY AFTER 17 YEARS OF TEACHING APPAREL, TEXTILE MARKETING.

AMY EBERT
Kansas State Collegian

Marlene McComas said working in the apparel industry provided the experience she needed to give her students insightful information about the industry. After 17 years of teaching at K-State, she has resigned.

McComas, instructor of apparel and textile marketing, came to K-State in 1980 after working as an associate buyer for a large department store.

She said this experience has helped make her classes more applicable and exciting for students.

"I think it's very important to have hands-on experience, so you know exactly what the students are getting into and how to help them prepare," McComas said.

Students said they agreed McComas' experience in the industry has added to their classes with her.

"The great thing about Marlene is that she's been out there, and she gets us excited about the industry, especially because she has such a great outlook on life," said Melinda Cortwright, senior in apparel and textile marketing.

Keylee Sanders, junior in apparel and textile marketing, said she agreed.

"She knows everyone in the business. She's the ultimate contact for jobs and internships," Sanders said.

While helping students find internships and jobs, McComas advised more than 30 students each year and taught six different classes during her time at K-State.

Along with her teaching duties, McComas served as the coordinator to the internship program for apparel and textile marketing majors.

She said the internship program has grown over the years, and students have completed internships at businesses around the nation.

"We've even started to do international internships," McComas said.

To help students gain more knowledge on the national level, McComas also planned study tours for students during the summer. Groups traveled to New York, Chicago and Minneapolis, Minn.

"On those trips, we saw how large companies operate. You can read about it in textbooks, but there's nothing like seeing it firsthand," she said.

Several apparel and textile marketing students organized a surprise party Monday to honor McComas and say goodbye.

McComas said she appreciated the chance to say goodbye to her students as well.

"I'll miss all of you. I already do," McComas said to the students.

2 university services develop programs to help students assess, manage stress

JENNIFER JANSONIUS
Kansas State Collegian

A program to help people assess and manage their stress has been developed by University Counseling Services and Recreational Services.

"The stress assessments, available to students, faculty, staff and alumni, look at the individual's lifestyle, stressors, dietary and exercise conditions," said Art Rathbun, counselor for Counseling Services.

Rathbun said the assessments are used to see how and to what extent stress affects the lives of individuals. Suggestions for improvement are also given during each half-hour session.

"Counselors give resources to improve the balance of stressors and tips to reduce the impact of stress," Rathbun said.

Stress assessments are available from 4 to 7 p.m. Monday through Friday at the Recreational Services' Wellness Resource Center, located in the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Group workshops for stress management will also be on Feb. 5 and 17 in the Recreational Service's Wellness Resource Center for anyone who uses the Rec Complex.

David Lusk, psychology intern for Counseling Services, said, "During the workshops, counselors will talk to each person to define their stress and how it manifests."

Lusk is a counselor for the first stress management workshop.

He said the workshops will reveal when stress levels become unhealthy and what strategies can be used to combat stress.

Greg Mondin, psychology intern for Counseling Services, will also lead a stress workshop on Feb. 17.

"We will gear each workshop toward individual needs to people in that group and tailor to their needs," Mondin said.

He said some people react to stress in a physical sense, including muscle tension or headaches. Others react in a psychological sense and might become nervous.

"The goals of the workshops are to make people aware of the stress they are experiencing and how they cope with that stress, and also to give new ways to cope with stress," Mondin said.

Rathbun said if the assessments and workshops have a high turnout at the Rec Complex, Counseling Services is likely to start other programs.

"We are looking at the possibility of integrating intramurals, lifestyles, health and exercise with fitness leaders and dietitians," Rathbun said.

Board should explain actions against director

Without offering due process, results of a performance evaluation or even a public statement, the Board of Student Publications Inc. vacated the position occupied by Director Ron Johnson at a 7 a.m. Wednesday meeting.

In bureaucratese, this means they fired him.

The board's interpretation was that Johnson, in his nine years at K-State, never legally had the position.

The board specifically went after Johnson, as its actions failed to even mention the two assistant Student Publications directors who also have split contracts.

While many of the board members were quick to take action during an executive session of the meeting, none of them were willing to admit in public why they had been planning this meeting in secret for several months.

They had never made Johnson's job performance a significant issue on the board before.

In other words, who was willing to suspend and disregard due process just to have Johnson fired Wednesday?

While that question will no doubt become apparent as this situation unfolds in the coming days, this issue sets enough of a dangerous precedent for students to be alarmed.

If this stands, all organizations that benefit from a student privilege fee might need to dust off their contracts and look into organization bylaws.

There has been no evaluation of Johnson's job performance by this board during this academic year, or even the past few years.

Johnson wasn't even told why he was fired at Wednesday's meeting. He was never given a grace period or informed about board member concerns.

Board members have also circulated letters without providing copies to Johnson, and they've had private meetings to discuss the employment of a nationally prominent director known for an award-winning publication. This issue not only affects employees of Student Publications, but the integrity of journalism at K-State.

If your city council conducted backroom political meetings and then acted without explanation or due process, you'd be furious.

The board is an elected body. Therefore, these student representatives answer to you. Have they?

The only people included in this discussion — which has ramifications beyond the borders of K-State — were themselves.

What is most disturbing, however, is Student Body President Tim Riemann worked behind the scenes to plan Wednesday's meeting. What constituency were they serving in taking this action?

The board should represent the best interests of Student Publications. It has failed miserably at this. State and national media attention to this ludicrous decision will not reinforce a positive image of K-State.

As one journalism adviser from an out-of-state school said Wednesday, "There goes your program."

What further perplexes us is that no one involved in the board's decision understands the implications of their own actions.

Yes, the position is vacated, but Johnson will continue working.

This question would be easier to answer if the parties involved would comment on what motivated their decision.

The following members voted to vacate the position: students Carlton Getz, Jason Ellis, Jay Witt, Julie Strickland and faculty members Barry Flinchbaugh and Bill Feyerharm.

According to the Manhattan Mercury, Feyerharm said he "didn't even want to get into this." Just when will it be appropriate to discuss this? Those who voted for the movement should be holding themselves accountable for their decision.

They should know that Johnson is more important to the Student Publications operation than to simply be let go with no explanation. Johnson is integral in providing students with complete control of the editorial content of the paper, a connection to the professional realm, and he acts as an advocate of freedom of press.

He acts as an internship adviser, resource, critic and mentor, on top of providing the corporation with vital business sense.

Johnson is to journalism what Coach Bill Snyder is to football.

If the board wants to restructure Student Publications, why fire the most valuable resource they had?

If these board members are truly concerned with restructuring the corporation, why has the attendance of some been less than stellar?

If they're not going to stay committed to their elected obligation on a regular basis, it's extremely questionable to see these faculty and students express so much interest in this one issue.

This action is clearly self-serving and the board needs to examine its actions. It needs to scrutinize the ramifications of making a decision this important based on undefined personal conflicts.

Clinton's foreign policy highlights land rush in Middle East

VIEWPOINT

PAUL ROBBERN

Paul is a senior in chemistry and biochemistry. You can send email to Paul at vlad@ksu.edu.

Wow. It's not often a columnist gets the opportunity to flambé a political figure two weeks in a row and feel completely justified. How do I mean completely? One hundred percent, totally, no room for remorse at all, completely. For everyone out there who has read my column regularly since its recent inception, no reminder should be necessary.

For the rest reading this, it should come as no surprise that of all the political figures I might have chosen to criticize last week, I chose to criticize our peerless leader, President Clinton, and his habit of selectively telling the truth.

This time around I feel it's important to analyze Clinton's selective application of logic to foreign policy. The analysis is important, in light of the situation with Iraq that might lead to a military conflict.

Clinton is hardly the first American president to face the daunting task of securing peace in the Middle East. The conflict between Israel and Palestine has existed since the creation of Israel and has been a particularly sore spot after the 1972 land grab put on by Israel.

Land grab? Yeah, land grab. Even worse than an Oklahoma sooner family that settled on property before the official start of the land rush, Israel simply stole land belonging to neighboring Lebanon, as well as encroaching into territory controlled by Palestine. Naturally, Israel doesn't see it that way, or at the very least Israeli officials will not label their actions in quite the same manner.

For its part, Israel maintains that the lands captured during military conflicts have been kept by Israel because of the occupied territories' strategic value in national security. Despite supposed initiatives to begin returning the occupied territories to their former owners, Israel continues to build settlements in these territories, in violation of resolutions passed by the United Nations.

Despite efforts by Palestine to arrive at some compromise concerning the withdrawal of Israeli military forces from the occupied territories, Israel refuses to budge on several key issues. Israel is not the only guilty party in this imbroglio, but many have suffered as a result of Israel's obstinacy, typically Palestinians who have been denied the right to earn a living as a result of Israel's policies.

Another sore spot in the Middle East is Iraq. I won't bore you with details, particularly because many reading this probably have a different life today because of Iraq's Saddam Hussein.

Iraq's ever-unpredictable despot was not deposed as a consequence of the armed conflict and recently has been making headlines. He masterfully has forced the hand of the American president.

He has forced the United States to act, more or less alone in the international community, by refusing to comply with U.N. resolutions about weapons of mass destruction.

He has refused to allow inspectors to view sites suspected of biological-weapon production. As heinous as these weapons are, and as flagrantly as Hussein has flaunted such resolutions, why should America stand alone?

While America has attempted to force Iraq's hand with an embargo that starves the neediest citizens, preventing food and medicine from reaching the ordinary citizen (seemingly not affecting the powerful — Hussein isn't going to starve tomorrow), America fails to demand that Israel comply with U.N. resolutions about the transfer of occupied territories. In fact, we underwrite loan guarantees to the tune of billions of dollars, so Israel can be sure every Israeli gets enough to eat.

While America protests Iraq's treatment of its Kurdish minority in the world community, Israel continues to use torture tactics to punish, and obtain information from, Palestinians, and we do nothing.

This is also the country that needed several days, and strong prodding from the United States, to decide a Maryland teen-ager who had never lived in Israel could be extradited to the United States to face murder charges stemming from the gruesome decapitation of another teen-ager.

While our relationship with Israel has been askew for many years, I can only wonder how many Americans will have to die protecting the "sanctimony of U.N. resolutions" in regard to Iraq, when our country's leaders have seemed perfectly willing to ignore such issues before when dealing with Israel.

Board should explain decision, not avoid unanswered questions

Editor,

I am deeply saddened to hear the Board of Student Publications chose to vacate the position of Student Publications Director at an early morning meeting Wednesday. The man who occupied that position — and the man I hope will continue to occupy it once the board realizes the folly of its decision — Ron Johnson, has worked tirelessly for students since I have known him. It is a terrible, terrible thing these board members have done.

I would like to know what it is Johnson has done to force the board to make such a decision, but I don't. Most of my e-mails to board members have gone without reply. Phone calls to their offices — most notably to the student body president — have gone unreturned. I will say, to his credit, that Tim Riemann did respond to an e-mail I sent him, though his response was so patronizing in tone, it insulted the office he has. No one on the board seems to want to pony up an answer. They seem to be hiding out. You'd think the folks who were in charge of the voice of the students would be less cowardly, that they would hold up their heads and say, "This is what I stand for." Alas, that is not the case. Weasels in dark times tend to burrow in and clam up.

So as they hide in their dark little cubbyholes and murmur every so often, "Can't talk. Personnel matters," let me tell you about Johnson and what journalism students learn from him. We learn to think on our feet. We learn to make decisions, good and bad. We learn that no matter how good we think we are there is always room for improvement.

We learn that not every young journalism student ends up at the Washington Post — some of us end up in places like the Garden City Telegram, the Salina Journal, the Valley Falls Vindicator, the Council Grove Republican, and many of us end up running whole parts of these newspapers. And we learn that decisions we make in college — right or wrong — become the foundation for making better and more responsible decisions once we become employed.

I myself worked at the Collegian for about five years. You know how lucky I was to do that? Student journalists at the University of Kansas get to work at the University Daily Kansan a semester and a half. Tops. The whole time the students work on the newspaper at KU, they're overseen by some administrative lackey who's probably less interested in the truth than he or she is interested in getting the university's spin out to the reading public. Then those students are thrust into the world with little experience and with little idea what it's like to be fully responsible for a newspaper.

I was just talking to a colleague several days ago about the proliferation of K-State grads here at the Kansas City Star. She said that the Star of late has hired more people from K-State than from KU and the University of Missouri put together. She also said, "Ron Johnson did a better job getting the kids ready for what they'd find at newspapers than any other school in the region."

Johnson and Student Publications are ahead of the curve in design, reporting, pagination, electronic media and on and on and on. What more can you ask for? However sad it might be, the No. 1 reason to go to college nowadays is to get a job. Johnson has prepared his students well, and in the time I worked with him, his professional behavior and his foresight were exemplary.

I would like to commend the members of the Board of Student Publications for caring enough about the university and the Collegian that they became involved with the process. Service in student activities is greatly rewarding but also time-consuming and challenging.

Making K-State a better place is an admirable mission, one I relished in my capacities as Collegian editor, student senator and student body vice president. But understand this: Ron Johnson was not the enemy. Eliminating him from the position at which he excels is shameful.

In fact, the board members would have disgraced K-State less had they swiped the Fiesta Bowl trophy and crapped in it.

Sincerely,

Increasing services, options benefit Wildcat card users

►CARD WIDELY ACCEPTED ON, OFF CAMPUS; GIVES STUDENTS NEW FREEDOM.

TIM RICHARDSON
Kansas State Collegian

A semester after the new Wildcat cards were issued at K-State, the number of services available to card holders is increasing.

However, the transition has not come without some confusion.

Some students remain unsure of the card's services, but Don Becker, manager of the Campus Card Center, said the benefits of the new card allowed students to experience new options that were previously unavailable.

"It was successful," he said. "Students found it convenient to use the card in many new ways."

Campus elections have benefited by using the card to verify students' current enrollment at the university, Becker said. Swiping the cards gives information that eliminates looking through computer print-outs for students' names.

K-State Student Union business manager Jack Thoman said a primary misunderstanding of the cards concerns the different accounts offered by the Wildcat card.

The Wildcat account, which the university has offered for several years, is used at the Union Bookstore, Quick Cats and other campus locations.

Off-campus transactions require a Commerce Bank checking account. This option of the Wildcat card, which has been available since the arrival of Commerce Bank in the Union, acts as a debit card.

"People need to understand the differences that there are between the two," Thoman said.

Sandy Clark, manager of the Commerce Bank branch in the Union, said the Wildcat card is accepted as payment at nearly 70 locations. Off-campus locations, which account for nearly half of the total, are in Aggieville and other student-oriented places.

The new cards are also equipped with a smart-chip, which allows a card holder to purchase from nearly 50 campus vending machines installed with the correct equipment.

Thoman said the university benefits from student use of the cards. In addition to the ease of transaction using the card, the university might be able to decrease its labor as less money is placed in the machines. He said this is also an advantage for security reasons.

The Wildcat card can also be used as a calling card by opening an account with K-State's Telecommunications office.

Thoman said about 20,000 new cards have been issued since August, with the potential of almost 4,000 more cards to be distributed to new students and students who have not replaced their old IDs.

The Campus Card Center will continue to replace old IDs and incorrectly laminated IDs for free. Lost or stolen cards can be replaced for $15.

The cards will have more capabilities later. Thoman said residence hall laundry machines, more vending machines and some campus copy machines might be equipped to accept the Wildcat card in the future.

"There's room for it to grow," he said. "We should certainly allow it to expand and make less hassles," he said.

SPORTS ROUND-UP

Sports Round-up is your daily dose of the latest scores, stats and news from the world of sports outside of K-State. Compiled from Associated Press reports.

NCAA top 25 men's basketball No. 3 Kansas 83, Iowa St. 62

AMES, Iowa — Paul Pierce scored 19 points and Lester Earl added 18 as the Jayhawks reached the 25-win mark for the ninth straight season.

Kansas (25-3, 9-1 Big 12) ran up its largest victory margin in Ames in 27 years. Iowa State (10-12, 3-6) trailed by only nine points midway through the second half but couldn't stay with the Jayhawks down the stretch.

Ryan Robertson scored 14 points for Kansas, 10 during a 25-6 run in the second half, and Raef LaFrentz added 12 points.

Marcus Fizer and Paul Shirley led Iowa State with 15 points each.

The Cyclones got within 47-38 with 10:32 remaining but the Jayhawks scored on 11 of their next 13 possessions to open a 72-44 lead.

No. 6 Kentucky 63, LSU 61

BATON ROUGE, La. — Wayne Turner's basket with 2:37 to play was Kentucky's final point of the game but the eighth-ranked Wildcats held on for a 63-61 victory over LSU on Wednesday night.

Turner's field goal gave Kentucky (20-3, 9-1 Southeastern Conference) a 63-56 lead. Reggie Tucker made two free throws with 2:23 left to bring the Tigers (9-11, 2-8) within five points.

Maurice Carter's three-pointer with 1:06 left brought LSU within 63-61 and the Tigers had a chance at tying the game, but Carter's shot bounced off the rim as time expired.

Kentucky missed its final three shots from the field after Turner's final basket.

LSU, which outshot Kentucky 45 percent-38 percent, has not beaten the Wildcats since 1992, a stretch of seven games.

Jeff Sheppard led Kentucky with 12 points, while Turner and Scott Padgett each had 11.

Carter had 19 points for LSU.

No. 16 Michigan St. 84, Ohio St. 58

COLUMBUS, Ohio — Jason Klein scored a career-high 25 points and the Spartans moved to 9-1, their best start ever in the Big Ten.

The first-place Spartans (16-4) have won seven straight and 12 of 13.

The loss was the 11th in a row for Ohio State (7-14, 0-8), extending the longest losing streak in the school's 99 years playing the sport. It was also the Buckeyes' 14th Big Ten loss in a row, extending another school record.

Klein, a junior, had never scored more than 17 points before, but surpassed that 1:05 into the second half. Klein, averaging 10.6 points, was 10-of-15 from the field, including two-of-five from three-point range.

NBA

Celtics 110, Mavericks 99

BOSTON — Dee Brown hit six three-pointers in the fourth quarter and scored a season-high 32 points as the Boston Celtics handed the Dallas Mavericks their 19th consecutive road loss, 110-99 Wednesday night.

Brown made eight of 10 shots from three-point range. His six three-pointers in the final period were one short of the NBA record for one quarter.

The Mavericks, 1-17 on the road against the Celtics, were led by Michael Finley with 18 points.

Jazz 101, Bulls 93

SALT LAKE CITY — Karl Malone scored 30 points and John Stockton had 17 points and 18 assists as the Utah Jazz rallied to beat the Chicago Bulls. Utah overcame a 24-point first-half deficit to become the first Western Conference team to sweep a season series with the Bulls in three years.

Michael Jordan scored 40 points for the Bulls, but Scottie Pippen missed the final 18 minutes of the game after he aggravated a pulled right hamstring. Dennis Rodman, averaging a league-leading 15.7 rebounds per game, was kept to four.

Heat 98, 76ers 84

PHILADELPHIA — Alonzo Mourning had 19 points and 15 rebounds as the Miami Heat handed the Philadelphia 76ers their seventh straight loss.

The Heat took the lead midway through the first quarter and cruised to their fourth victory over the 76ers this season.

Tim Hardaway had 15 points and five assists for the Heat. Jamal Mashburn added 14 points and seven rebounds, while Isaac Austin had 12 points and nine rebounds.

Wizards 104, Cavaliers 88

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Reserve Tracy Murray scored 24 points and Juwan Howard had 22 points and 13 rebounds as the Washington Wizards won their third straight.

The Wizards played without leading scorer Chris Webber, who strained his right shoulder in Monday's victory over Detroit.

Zydrunas Ilgauskas scored 18 points for the Cavaliers, who have lost a season-high three straight road games.

Timberwolves 95, Knicks 88

MINNEAPOLIS, Minn. — Stephon Marbury scored 29 points as the Minnesota Timberwolves defeated the New York Knicks.

Marbury, a New York native, added 10 assists as the Wolves snapped a three-game losing streak and handed the Knicks their fifth loss in six games.

Allan Houston scored 20 points for the Knicks, and Charles Oakley grabbed 14 rebounds.

Cats lose crucial home game to Sooners

DAN MERKER
Kansas State Collegian

The ball didn't fall the right way for the K-State women's basketball team Wednesday night. Two potential game-tying shots by the Wildcats failed to go in the basket, and the team lost 69-67 to the Oklahoma Sooners to drop to 9-10 on the season, 3-6 in Big 12 play.

K-State fell behind the 8-11 Sooners early, trailing 17-10 early in the contest, but battled back to take a four-point lead with a 13-2 run. The Cats extended that lead to 29-23 on a jumper by guard Brit Jacobson with 3:36 left in the first half.

At that point, K-State coach Deb

Patterson substituted four starters, with guard Kim Woodlee the only starter on the court, and Oklahoma took advantage by scoring 12 of the final 14 points of the half to lead 35-31 at the break.

"That was a situation where I had hoped to give our starters a bit of a blow," Patterson said. "I think in the end, it cost us. I think losing that lead was critical to the end result here in this game. The end result shows that that was a bad decision."

K-State had a good half by its post players. Brandy Harris and Nicky Ramage combined for 21 of K-State's 31 points in the half, while keeping Sooner forward Phylasha Whaley, the conference's leading scorer, to only six points. Whaley also picked up her third foul with 3:40 left in the half.

Sooner players used their momentum to extend their lead to 50-40 six minutes into the second half, but the Cats went on a 11-0 run over the next 4:30 to take a 51-50 lead.

The teams traded punches from there, exchanging the lead nine consecutive times until Sooner forward Michele Workman knocked down a three-pointer to extend the lead to five points.

The Sooners kept that five-point lead into the final minute, until K-State center Angie Finkes sunk one-of-two free throws to cut the lead to four. While Oklahoma was bringing the ball up the court, Jacobson stole the ball, but was called for traveling.

angering the Bramlage Coliseum crowd.

Woodlee fouled Oklahoma guard Shonika Breedlove, who missed the front end of a one-and-one to keep the lead at four. K-State forward Jenny Coalson was fouled and made two free throws to cut the Sooner lead to 69-67 with 20.3 seconds left.

Harris fouled Oklahoma's Roxanne Long, who also missed the front end of a one-and-one. Harris pulled down the rebound, and the Cats called a time out to set up a potential game-tying play.

The ball ended up in the hands of Jacobson, K-State's only senior, who drove down the right side, parallel to the baseline, and missed a reverse lay-up.

Harris grabbed the rebound, but her attempt rolled out of the cylinder as time expired, and the Cats lost by a bucket.

The Sooners shot 68 percent for the second half, and sunk eight-of-15 three-point attempts on the night. K-State was two-of-seven from beyond the arc. Long led the way with five, and Workman had the other three. They each had 17 points to lead the Sooners.

The game was Oklahoma's first conference road win, pulling a game ahead of the Cats in the conference standings at 4-5.

"This is an extremely significant loss," Patterson said. "It's a team we were tied with — a home game. It cer-

Royals players sign autographs at Manhattan Town Center

JOHN STOUS
Kansas State Collegian

Kansas City Royals baseball doesn't come to Manhattan often, but when it does, look out.

Three Royals players, one coach and the team mascot, Slugger, came to town Wednesday night and signed autographs in Manhattan Town Center for an hour and a half.

"Manhattan isn't a real big city, and I think that there was a pretty good turnout," outfielder Jermaine Dye said.

Lines to meet players and get autographs began forming 15 minutes before the signings actually started. Nicole Young, 9, a fourth grader at Eugene Field Grade School, came with her parents and two sisters to meet the players.

"This was really cool," she said. "Someday these signed cards may be worth a lot of money."

Bench coach Jamie Quirk, pitchers Jaime Bluma and Glendon Rusch, and Dye represented the Royals, signing autographs from 6:30 to 8 p.m. in the food court. Rusch, a highly touted prospect, said participating in the tour was an important thing for the players to do heading into the season.

"This is a great opportunity for the younger guys like Jermaine, Jaime and myself to let the fans get to know us and recognize us," he said.

The Royals were visiting on their annual tour of fan-based cities visiting schools, hospitals and local malls. This was the final stop on a tour of 22 cities through five states, Royals Director of Publicity and Community Relations Jim Lachimia said.

Lachimia traveled with them throughout the tour and said stops like these are not only good for the Royals organization, but also for all of baseball.

"For the people of Manhattan and other cities like it, to get to know these guys, is good because when they see that they are pretty good guys, they are more likely to stick with us and continue to support us through the rough times," he said.

Karen Irvine, a Manhattan resident, won a drawing, which took place in the mall, to have a family dinner with the Royals at Carlos O'Kelly's, but it was canceled this afternoon. Instead of the dinner, the family received an autographed bat and glove, as well as free baseball cards and tickets to a game.

The tickets also came with passes allowing the family into the stadium early to watch batting practice and the teams warm up.

Irvine said she didn't know what she registered for when she signed her family up, but her husband found out they won dinner with the players on the radio yesterday morning.

"I just signed our name up and dropped it in the box. It didn't really have any markings about what it was for," she said.

Her son, Brandon, an 11-year-old sixth grader at Woodrow Wilson School, said he had to buy a Royals baseball to get it signed. He also said this will be the second Royals game he has ever been to.

"I will take my glove with me. Maybe I will get to catch a foul ball," he said. "Meeting the players and getting our picture taken was really cool."

Dangerfield, women in sports reporting have one thing in common: no respect

VIEWPOINT

SUN DEE MILLS
Sun Dee is a senior in electronic journalism. You can send e-mail to Sun Dee at sundeem@ksu.edu.

Linda Cohn, SportsCenter. Bonnie Bernstein, ESPN News. Sun Dee Mills, CNN.

Sounds good, doesn't it?

No, that's not my new job — yet. But I'll get there. Though it won't be like any job I've had before, where if you do good work people will instantly respect you. In fact, it'll be quite the opposite.

A little story to illustrate my point. Last summer, I interned with a TV station in Kansas City, Mo., in the sports department. The highlight of my job came when I went to the preseason Chiefs-Panthers game at Arrowhead Stadium and got to watch it from the press box.

I'd made it. I'd arrived. Never mind that I was carrying around the camera bag.

After the game, I went with another female reporter from my station to the Panthers' locker room to do postgame interviews.

Although in college reporting you'll never see a locker room, it wasn't my first time in one — I had done postgame interviews with the Royals and the MLS Wizards.

But as we stood there talking to Panther running back Tim Biakabutuka about his game, loud whispers echoed behind us.

"What are they doing in here? This is a man's game. They don't know anything about it."

Maybe there is a shortage of female sports journalists in North Carolina. I should send a résumé there. But for some reason, I don't think it would be welcome. There's certainly no shortage in this area. There are a couple of women in sports at Kansas City stations, a couple in Topeka and one in Junction City.

The Kansas City Star employs several female sports writers and the K-State basketball beat writer for the Topeka Capitol-Journal is a woman as well. I've probably left some out, but you get the idea.

Most of these women I know, respect and look up to as mentors. All of the athletes I've met on the college level I respect as well. So what happens when they turn pro?

Like last year, Houston Rocket Charles Barkley publicly trashed NBC commentator Hannah Storm during the 1997 NBA playoffs because he said he felt she had no business commenting on men's basketball. Barkley had to apologize to Storm in a halftime interview to save face.

In the New England Patriots locker room, Boston Herald reporter Lisa Olson suffered repeated harassment from members of the team in the early 1990s. She said the players, the organization and the higher-ups in management, eventually moving to Australia when the publicity became too much.

And guys I know tell me that they don't think Linda Cohn could ever be as entertaining to watch as Kenny Mayne or Dan Patrick, simply because she's a woman.

The Rodney Dangerfield syndrome. No respect. But it's becoming harder to change the channel. Since 1995, ESPN has hired more than 35 women for on-air work. The influx of women in the field in Kansas is also proof.

One local sports reporter I talked to said as a woman, you have to prove yourself every day. "People will often say, 'Wow, what a good story! I'm impressed,' like they're surprised. I guess it's more surprise than just expected," she said.

I've gotten this reaction from readers

But thankfully, most players and coaches have been respectful to me. In fact, Suzyn Waldman, the first woman to broadcast a nationally televised baseball game, said it can be advantageous to be the opposite gender.

"I can ask Wade Boggs what he was thinking on a pitch and he'll tell me," she said in an interview with Glamour magazine. "Guy reporters, who are often frustrated athletes, can come across like they're criticizing."

Most of the time, when I rattle off some random sports fact in the company of men who don't know what I do, they're impressed.

They can't believe a woman knows the difference between a touchdown and a touchback.

Now, I'll readily admit I'm still learning about the sports world. I wasn't fortunate enough to have it shoved down my throat as a child like most guys. And I'm sure there are people out there who haven't ever read a column or a story of mine because of my gender.

But if and when I do get that big break, enlighten your friends and don't let them change the channel. Thanks.

Small business delivers to hungry clients

► FOOD EXPRESS BRINGS RESTAURANTS' SPECIALS DIRECTLY TO CUSTOMERS IN 45 MINUTES OR LESS.

AMY MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

The owners of a new food-delivery service said two factors hindered their business in the beginning: the company's perceived novelty by Manhattan residents and local restaurants' reluctance to become involved.

Adrian Campbell, senior in marketing and one of the owners of Food Express, said he didn't expect confusion about the business's concept. Customers can call one number, and within 45 minutes, food from any of 10 Manhattan restaurants will arrive at their door.

"We didn't realize how hard it would be to get it across," said Ralph Thomas, K-State graduate and Campbell's business partner. People were confused about whom to call, Food Express, the restaurants or both, he said.

Campbell said he thought once people were familiar with Food Express, the business would do well in Manhattan. He said he has seen similar companies thriving since the 1980s, especially on the coasts.

Despite the novelty of being strictly a food-delivery business, Food Express has developed a repeat-customer base since May, Campbell said.

"If they like the service, we know we're doing something right," Thomas said.

Initial reluctance from local restaurants was another problem.

"Some of them, because it's a new service, were hesitant," Campbell said.

He said Food Express overcame this obstacle with technology. Thermal carrying bags keep the food warmer than if customers picked up carry-out orders themselves, he said. A dispatcher keeps track of the drivers' locations throughout the city and places orders to the restaurants, timing them so the food won't sit and wait to be picked up, he said.

"The drivers are usually at the restaurant before the meal is up," he said.

JILL JARSULIC/Collegian

RALPH THOMAS, K-STATE GRADUATE, AND ADRIAN CAMPBELL, SENIOR IN MARKETING AND INTERNATIONAL BUSINESS, OWN AND OPERATE FOOD EXPRESS OUT OF CAMPBELL'S HOME. THEY DELIVER FOOD FROM VARIOUS ESTABLISHMENTS IN TOWN.

Rebecca Stewart, senior in hotel and restaurant management, works at Smash Hit Subs, Hot Stuff Pizza and Cinnamon Street Bakery, which are all at the same location. She said she has seen a positive effect on sales since Food Express began.

"It's increased our business. Our sub delivery has increased a lot," she said.

Campbell, formerly a manager at Mr. Goodcents Subs & Pastas, said he did research on starting up a food-delivery business in Manhattan and saved money for about a year before he opened Food Express. He obtained information from the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce on the population of the city and the cost of equipment before developing a business plan, he said.

Thomas said they built the business piece by piece, first purchasing a computer, then a fax machine and a radio system. He said Food Express is headquartered out of his apartment, so they didn't have to come up with additional rent money for the business.

Thomas said after they put a menu together in November for distribution to local businesses and participating restaurants, Food Express' sales increased.

"Sales jumped amazingly after the books came out," he said.

Thomas and Campbell said they consider these books their best advertising. They said they thought with an eye-catching design on the outside, the menus inside would sell the food.

Spring theater performances provide variety

DIANA LEE
Kansas State Collegian

The spring line of K-State theater department productions are up, running and on their way.

"We try to choose a comedy, a classic and something more dramatic, so this year we have a nice variety," said Marci Maullar, associate professor of speech communication, theater and dance.

"Goodnight Desdemona," "Vanessa" and "The Tempest" will be presented in Nichols Theatre this semester.

"Goodnight Desdemona" takes the stories of "Othello" and "Romeo and Juliet," adds a character and twists and turns them upside down," Karl Rutherford, stage manager, said.

The lighting design for "Goodnight Desdemona" was done by theater student Hona Cookman.

"It takes a lot of time to do the designing, and part of it is just the thinking period," Cookman said.

"We start designing months ahead of time and read through the script at least three times. The lighting is the element that is most easily changed, so the lighting designer usually ends up making changes after meeting with the set and costume designers."

Maullar said "Vanessa" is very well respected in the opera world and has won a Pulitzer Prize.

"Vanessa" is dramatic with romantic music, but the story is kind of dark," Maullar said.

"The Tempest," a comedy, is one of Shakespeare's best-known plays and is usually considered one of his best, Maullar said.

"The Tempest" will be really visually exciting, and it has a very large cast. It will be done on an island setting since it has some native themes. It should be really cool," Rutherford said.

Maullar said the amount of student work in the productions depends on the show.

"Students think of them as their shows. They build sets, help with costumes and sometimes design sets, costumes and lights when they have reached a certain level. All of the backstage work is done by the students," Maullar said.

The students involved in the productions rehearse three hours per night, five or six days a week, for six to eight weeks, all in preparation for their respective opening nights.

MEGAN LARUE/Collegian

Exposure answer to romance woes

Dear Cassandra,

I was reading the Collegian this afternoon, and I found your ad. How ironic, because I was just thinking of ways to restore my practically non-existent love life. Don't get me wrong, I like my single life. But it seems like everywhere I turn — I'm bombarded by couples. I really want to meet someone before Valentine's Day. It would be nice to go out on a date or just spend some time with someone. Like I said, I do enjoy my single life. I don't want a serious relationship, just maybe an occasional date every now and then. Any suggestions?

Thanks,
Naomi

My dear sweet Naomi,

Laundry mats, study clubs, classes, grocery store vegetable aisles, weddings, funerals and gas stations are a great place to meet people who might have something in common with you. Find some cool girlfriends to hang out with. You don't need a man to have fun.

Love,
Cassie

Little Naomi,

One word: cleavage. The answer is right there in front of you. Dress like you're worth noticing, and no matter where you are, people will notice you. A great personality is fine and dandy, but those are a dime a dozen, and they won't get you a date. The '90s man wants someone with sex appeal.

Thanks,
Jack

Jack,

My roommate and her boyfriend are two of my best friends and I spend a lot of time with them. They never get tired of me tagging along on dates, but they are constantly obsessed with finding me a boyfriend. How do I politely tell them I am happy just hanging out with them?

Boyfriendless Roommate

Dear B.R.,

They are trying to find you a boyfriend so you will leave them alone! They are obviously just too nice to tell you to hit the road so they can get it on. Find a hobby, another friend or a significant other — anything to leave them alone.

Love,
Cassie

You can send e-mail to Cassandra at cassandra@spub.ksu.edu.

Dear B.R.,

Now I have been wrong before, but I would venture this longing you have for time with them hides a subconscious desire for a beginning of an intimate relationship with them both. If this is truly what you want, go for it. You might be surprised at their response. Why else would they want you to bring someone else into the circle?

Thanks,
Jack

College needs to find alternative to lab fees

JENNIFER LUCKE
Kansas State Collegian

The A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications will no longer be charging computer lab fees.

The college has charged fees for students taking classes in the department to use the computer labs and the labs in the journalism library since the late 1980s. Students were issued a card and given access to the labs after paying the fees. Last term the fee was $25.

That system has become a thing of the past, said Todd Simon, director of the school.

"For something to be designated a fee it needs to go through a chain of approvals," Simon said.

He said the fee had not been approved by the Kansas Board of Regents.

Simon said that after meeting with the K-State Controller's Office, it was his understanding the fee violates regents policy. He said K-State's policy has been reinterpreted. The Controller's Office wants to set up a uniform system.

"The big issue, as it was explained to us, is that it was pretty much a straight-up lab fee. We can charge for consumables, but the university doesn't consider hardware or software consumables," Simon said.

The university considers such things as printer paper and ink consumables.

Fran Willbrant, associate controller, said the Controller's Office didn't deny the fee, just that it needed to be handled and approved through a different process, the comprehensive fee schedule.

According to the regents policy and procedure handbook, board approval must be obtained prior to the establishment of fees earning more than $100,000. Fees totaling less than that amount can be left up to the discretion of the chief executive officer of each institution. All fees have to be included in the annual comprehensive fee schedule which is sent to the board.

"We recommended that any student fees go on the fee schedule, regardless of the total amount," Willbrant said.

A representative from the board said regents' approval is required of any fee that is required of every student as a condition of enrollment. The CEO of each institution can establish user and administrative fees which must be incorporated into the fee schedule.

"We are not aware of any problems with computer lab fee charges at KSU," Barb Conant, regents director of communications, said.

Willbrant said the Controller's Office presents the comprehensive fee schedule annually. The board looks at the fee schedules for all universities. The Controller's Office recommended that if the journalism school wanted to continue charging fees it should submit a letter to the vice president of the university, who reviews the fee schedule.

"The comprehensive fee schedule requires a higher level of approval because it affects the students," Willbrant said.

The lab fee generated about $7,000 a year. Twice as much was spent upgrading the labs. The department already spends its own money on the upkeep of the labs. Simon said there was enough money in the account to carry through the spring semester.

For now the department doesn't plan on seeking endorsement of the fee.

"I didn't feel like it was in our best interest to make such a big pitch for such a small fee. We'd have to look into a chain of approvals," Simon said.

Alternatives to charging student fees have not yet been discussed.

"We can charge materials fees, but the amount that yields is pretty small and requires a lot of record keeping," Simon said. "Seeking formal approval of the kind of fee we had before is a possibility. Some schools have gotten university or board-approved fees on a credit hour basis or based on what course you enroll in. The last option is if there is anyone out there who wants to support the school with donations, we're always open to it."

Willbrant does not see the decision affecting any other colleges within the university at this time. She said other colleges did not use the same process for charging fees.

"I am not aware of it. If we become aware of it, something will be done," Willbrant said.

Speaker stresses experiences, leadership

JOSHUA STURGILL
Kansas State Collegian

Junction City Commissioner Lloyd Parker said that integrity and strong leadership are important in business and personal life.

Parker gave a speech entitled, "Creating a New Career: Building on Past Experience," as part of a seminar series sponsored by the Small Business Development Center in the Ramada Inn Ballroom Wednesday.

His speech drew from his personal experience as well as his experience in the military.

"You have to have hindsight to know where you've been, foresight to know where you're going, and insight to know when you've gone too far," Parker said, quoting an Irish proverb when he opened his speech.

As the oldest of 12 children in a poor family while growing up in rural Louisiana, Parker said he needed foresight to know where he was going.

"When I was growing up we had three meals," he said. "Oatmeal, cornmeal and no meal."

Parker is now a retired Battalion Command Sergeant Major and has since built Contract Services Inc., a million-dollar business, in addition to being city commissioner of Junction City.

Fred Rice, director of SBDC at K-State, said Parker was "a success story — success through hard work."

Rice also praised Parker for his nomination as Kansas' Small Business Person of the Year in 1997, and as Minority Small Business Person of the Year in 1996.

Rice said that Parker is a man who has achieved the economic empowerment that the Rev. Al Sharpton was speaking about at K-State Tuesday.

In his speech, Parker discussed factors of leadership and the importance of exercising integrity at the office and at home.

People must know their strengths and weaknesses to be a worthy role model, Parker said. Day to day examples of courage will set standards for employees.

"Live the values you expect from subordinates," he said. "Integrity is the basis for trust. You must demonstrate integrity in your personal life or trust is broken."

Parker also advised that leaders ask themselves several key questions about their business or organization's vision, standards and resources.

"These questions must be asked at the right time and in the right manner according to the strengths of employees," he said.

Parker divides his time between his business and his job as city commissioner. He said he chose to run for this position because he wanted to give back to the community.

"Giving back to the community is the ultimate satisfaction. That's why I chose to be city commissioner," he said. "I felt it was something I needed to do."

Parker's presentation was part of SBDC's 16th Annual Professional Development Seminar Series, which focuses on the development of personal and professional skills in the workplace.

Student Publications board vacates director's position

that we try to carry on as close to normal as we can until this situation resolves itself," Nicholls said. "It is going to take a while for some of these questions to be answered."

Simon, who has two law degrees, said he was also uncertain what Wednesday's action by the board meant for Johnson.

"The only clear effect of this motion that I think the board can say with certainty is that the board has directed that no more corporate funds be expended for the 50 percent of Ron Johnson's contract represented by Student Publications work," he said.

As board chairman, Simon couldn't vote in Wednesday's meeting because the vote wasn't tied. But he publicly opposed the motion, saying the move was too drastic. Any legal issues should be resolved another way, he said, and any board members' complaints about Johnson's performance should be addressed differently.

"I think our first responsibility is to play fair with our employees," he said. "Playing fair is having a hearing, doing an inquiry and giving a person accused of poor performance in a particular area a chance to improve that perception."

Johnson said he has never been officially notified of complaints about his performance. But Collegian representative to the board Kevin Klassen said Johnson's work as director played a large role in the decision to vacate the director's position.

"I think it's safe to say that Ron's performance was the motivating factor to vacate his position because I believe that the contractual concerns could have been solved without that action," Klassen said.

Furthermore, Klassen said little documentation of any complaints about Johnson exists.

"I never saw much documentation about concerns with Ron's performance or behavior as an employee of Student Publications," he said. "The only documentation I saw was letters of concern by a few people who I believe had personal and political motivations in writing them."

Klassen said members of Student Governing Association were behind many of the complaints.

"The people who wrote the letters had either strong ties to SGA or were disgruntled ex-Collegian employees or both," he said.

Johnson said he has never seen the letters.

Tuesday, board member Carlton Getz said firing Johnson could have been necessary to help Student Publications when its student fee comes up for review in Privilege Fee Committee this month.

That was in response to a question about Johnson's performance at a Privilege Fee Committee meeting earlier this fall, when some committee members said they were insulted by Johnson's remarks on a student government typographical error that caused a $120,000 loss in student money to Student Publications.

Nicholls said if personnel concerns fueled the board's decision, Johnson should have been put through some type of evaluation process. But in this case, he said it seems Johnson's performance has been mixed with other issues.

"There's no denying that the Board of Student Publications is the entity to which Ron Johnson reports, and it's the entity which pays his salary as director," Nicholls said. "They have every right to evaluate his performance, but that's not what happened."

"They also have every right to ensure student funds are spent properly, but it seems like those two issues have been mixed up somehow," he said. "I only wish if the Board of Student Publications had a problem with his performance, they would've had a chance to review his performance, but that's not what happened."

Though board members have said Wednesday's action wasn't a personal attack, Johnson said the move for his dismissal, however disguised, is a personal one.

"It was an excellent attempt to misdirect board members from evaluating me or sharing with me the complaints and the sources of those complaints," he said. "The complaints against me have remained secret, and this has been an amazing attempt to avoid getting me due process as an employee."

But in an e-mail to Johnson shortly after the meeting, board member Jay Witt said the board wasn't making a statement about Johnson's performance as director. Witt sent a copy of the e-mail to Collegian staff.

"I know this may sound like a technically-laced justification of a move to screw you," Witt said in the message to Johnson. "It absolutely is not."

Witt also encouraged Johnson to apply for the director's position when the board gets control of the director's salary and contract. But according to his university contract that won't expire until 1999, Johnson is still the director.

Though two other Student Publications employees' contracts are similar to Johnson's, their situations weren't addressed in the meeting. Only Johnson's position was declared vacant by the board.

Johnson said he thinks that indicates other issues are at play besides who signs his contract.

"It's fascinating that they directed this motion specifically to me as director," he said.

"That indicates to me that it was clearly punitive in nature. If their intentions were honorable, then why was it directed at one position and one person?"

In a memo to journalism school faculty late Wednesday, Simon said no immediate action could be taken until a legal opinion could be reached about the board's decision.

Service limits long-distance billing

"In our situation, we have four people sharing one phone line. Every two weeks our phone kept getting shut off, and we would have to mail in money. Some of these bills would take two to three weeks to reach the company, so in the meantime, we couldn't call long distance," she said.

Harrah also mentioned that the service works like a credit card.

"Customers do have the option of calling our 1-800 service to inquire about their bill," she said. "If they are near the $200 mark, we will suggest they make a payment to keep their service from being shut off. We try to stress that payments must be made."

Bott had her own suggestions about the new service.

"I don't think it's fair that they keep this limit on customers with four to five people per household. I understand they had to do something about people paying their bills on time, but maybe the $200 limit could be increased for bigger households," she said.

The Consumer and Tenant Affairs office on campus deals with problems of this nature.

"I think the program Southwestern Bell has introduced could be very beneficial to those students who have problems paying their bills," Kathy Beier, director of Consumer and Tenant Affairs, said.

"I can also understand why they set a limit on monthly calls. The service only lasts for a year, so those students who are responsible about bills shouldn't have a problem with this."

Program would replace Board of Regents

"We have moved beyond a plan to get a plan," Adkins said.

"I see it as the first major consensus point that we've reached," he said of the nine-member special House panel named by Speaker Tim Shallenburger, R-Baxter Springs, to develop a plan for restructuring the management of higher education this session.

"I think the committee has embraced it as where we need to go," Adkins said. "If we can figure out the financial piece and put the two together, I think we can meet our February 10 deadline (set by Shallenburger for reporting a plan.)"

Cost could be a significant obstacle. A tentative list of projected costs of money the committee has discussed putting into higher education — to enhance quality and to attract support among the regents and community college constituencies — totals $480 million.

"Are these in American dollars?" Adkins said when he first saw the list.

It includes $317 million for regents institutions — compared with $24 million in new money proposed by Gov. Bill Graves in his budget — as well as $47 million more for community colleges, nearly $13 million to take Washburn into the state system, and $55 million for the vo-tech schools.

Rep. Henry Helgeson, D-Wichita, a member of the House Appropriations Committee, said a more realistic figure was probably about one-fourth of the $480 million that legislators would go for. The general plan upon which consensus was reached calls for having two divisions under the Council of Higher Education — one for governance of the six universities and Washburn and one to coordinate activities of the community colleges and vo-tech schools, who would retain their local boards of trustees.

Details such as how many members the council would have and who would appoint them remain to be decided by the committee.

The panel also has made no final decision on whether Washburn becomes a full-fledged state university or is given additional funding equal to that the community colleges would receive.

Telefund pulls in record-setting total pledge for 1st week

SARA ZENGER
Kansas State Collegian

The KSU Foundation Telefund is off to a record-setting start after one week of dialing.

Gordon Dowell, director of annual giving for the KSU Foundation, said this year has the potential to be the best ever.

"It's going extraordinarily well," Dowell said. "Enthusiasm and momentum have never been this good this early."

The total pledge amount was $277,928 as of Thursday morning. Dowell said this amount puts the Telefund on record-setting pace.

Dowell said an addition to Telefund this year is having all nine colleges call faculty members for pledges. This has resulted in $3,000 in pledges from faculty after Wednesday night. Each of the nine academic deans has also pledged $1,000.

Telefund is the world's largest telephone fund-raising campaign for post-secondary education.

The campaign started Sunday. By the end of February, 1,400 student volunteers will have called about 70,000 alumni across the United States.

The money raised by Telefund is used for scholarships and other educational benefits.

The colleges of Architecture, Planning and Design and Engineering called alumni earlier this week. Diane Potts, director of business and administrative services for the College of Architecture, Planning and Design, said this year's Telefund was a success for the college.

"We raised $46,653. This was a 10.5-percent increase over last year, and last year we had a 36-percent increase," Potts said.

"It can be challenging to call if you've never done it before, but once they get into it they find it fun and exciting. We have a lot of callers come back year after year and get good prizes," Potts said.

Joe Wilson, senior in landscape architecture, has participated in Telefund for three years.

"I love it. It's pretty much a good way to keep in touch with alumni and get job interviews at the same time," Wilson said.

Khris House, fifth-year senior in architectural engineering and pre-law, called for the College of Engineering this week. This was House's fourth year as a Telefund caller.

"I see it as a way for me to help out my college. You're also helping yourself since the money goes to scholarships and equipment," House said.

Dowell said in addition to having a successful fund-raising week, Telefund also experienced a technological first.

"This was the first time ever that Telefund received a caller ID phone call. Someone saw the number, called back and that led to a pledge," Dowell said.

The College of Arts and Sciences finished out this first week of Telefund. It will continue calling next week along with the College of Education and K-State-Salina. Telefund will continue until Feb. 25.

What do we think?

The Collegian editorial board congratulates the Telefund on its record-setting first week. See Page 4.

Friends University installs Internet filtering system

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA — After someone sent pornographic pictures via e-mail to many Friends University computer users, school officials decided to take action.

The solution — blocking access to objectionable material — has caused a new set of problems.

Since Net Nanny was installed five days ago, the Internet filter also has screened information needed for valid research studies.

"This is part of the challenge of allowing students access to the world of information and, at the same time, maintaining standards that are appropriate" for a Christian university, President Biff Green said Wednesday.

According to the school's Community Life Standards Policy, students are barred from possessing indecent literature on campus. It seemed only fair, Green said, to apply the standard to computer screens.

He predicted that if the problems with the software couldn't be resolved, "it's not going to last very long."

University officials said students hadn't complained about the change, but they had heard from faculty members.

Wayne Howdeshell, chairman of sociology and behavioral sciences, said using the filtered Internet to do academic research could be frustrating. At times, the filter seems to arbitrarily select what material to allow to the user.

For example, with the Excite search engine, he could access information on prostitution in Nevada, but not in Sweden. Looking into churches' stances on homosexuality, he could get to sites that explained the Quakers', but not the Episcopal Church's.

As "somewhat of a civil libertarian," Howdeshell said he believes in freedom of information. But, he said, the solution to unintentional encounters of offensive material in e-mail messages "is a dilemma I haven't resolved."

CNS unsupportive of e-mail censorship

LORY STONE
Kansas State Collegian

The implementation of Net Nanny, an Internet filter, at Friends University raises the question of the freedom of Internet access to students.

The original purpose of Net Nanny was to prevent the transfer of pornographic materials through e-mail.

However, the filter can also block information needed for research.

Ken Conrow, interim director of Computing and Network Services, said such a screening system is unforeseeable for K-State.

"The First Amendment doesn't let you block things on the basis of content," Conrow said.

Conrow said Net Nanny screens on the basis of content, and CNS believes this undermines the right of free expression. At K-State, blocking only occurs if it threatens the system, he said.

"If there is congestion or something, we try to find other means of blocking things," Conrow said.

He said if a World Wide Web site on K-State's network grows to more than 10 megabytes, it is automatically shut down by CNS.

Web pages begin running early in the morning and continue until they reach that quota.

"Extremely popular Web sites stop before most of us wake up," Conrow said.

Whether these sites contain pornography is not the issue. Rather, these sights just can't serve large volumes of people, Conrow said.

Another blocking system that occurs at K-State deals with spamming. Conrow said spamming is a form of e-mail that comes from an address that doesn't exist.

"Spamming is very practical for commercial interests, but it is against computer etiquette. It comes from places that don't exist and so the presumption is that it is unwanted," Conrow said.

"People who would like to use us as a relay point for spamming are also blocked," he said.

He said these types of blockage were not content-related.

"These are the only things that are blocked right now, and I don't foresee this changing in the future," Conrow said.

The Circle K Club of K-State donated its time and effort in helping the Manhattan Emergency Shelter on Thursday night.

Members from the organization volunteered to clean the shelter as one of their community service projects.

"This is our first year to do work at the shelter," said Melissa Stein, junior in pre-med and president of the Circle K Club. "We volunteered a little last semester."

The club is celebrating International Circle K Week by doing community service in the Manhattan area.

"Fraternities, sororities and the Circle K Club all help out the guests at the shelter," said Matt Lambert, night staff supervisor for the Manhattan Emergency Center.

"We give the volunteers a list of house duties, such as sweeping, mopping, and doing dishes," Lambert said.

Guests of the shelter usually have chores to do each night, but not when volunteers are there to help out.

"Every night at 9 p.m. is chore time for the guests," he said. "But when volunteers come in, the guests have a chance to rest at night."

Lambert said past guests of the shelter have even returned to volunteer.

"I think volunteering is a good learning experience for everyone involved to realize guests in here aren't much unlike themselves," Lambert said. "You don't have to be stereotypical — in rags and unshaven — to be homeless."

To continue their work for International Circle K Week, members of Circle K are collecting money in the K-State Student Union today. The money will help fund research to get rid of iodine deficiency disorder, the largest curable cause of mental retardation in the world.

"We try to do different projects because the members have different interests," Stein said. "We're based on community service, but we like to focus on children."

The club also volunteers for the Big Brothers, Big Sisters of America program and at the Wharton Manor nursing home, among others.

"We also tutor for an after-school program for younger children, once a week at the Ogden Friendship House," Stein said.

The club sets up service projects by contacting organizations in the community to see which groups need support.

"I contact places that the club has always volunteered community service, but we're always looking for new ones," said Matt Bell, sophomore in biology and pre-med and the community service committee chair.

Bell said it's important to give up time for others. He added that while it helps them, it also helps the volunteer.

"It feels good to help out other people," Bell said.

Irregular heartbeat likely caused death of high school student, coroner states

A Manhattan High School student most likely died as a result of cardiac arrhythmia, an irregular and deadly heartbeat rhythm, Riley County Deputy Coroner Dr. John Bambara said.

Raina Jones, 16, was pronounced dead at Mercy Health Center on College Avenue about 6:20 a.m. Wednesday. She was found dead at home earlier that morning and could not be resuscitated, Bambara said.

There are predisposing factors for cardiac arrhythmia, such as an enlarged heart and a low heart rate, he said.

"An enlarged heart can be normal for an athletic person," Bambara said. "When the heart rate drops, that is another predisposing factor."

Bambara said there was no autopsy. Jones' family wanted to donate her organs, he said.

The heart will be processed for pathology in Wichita. Bambara said he does not expect anything from the toxicology and blood chemistry tests results, either.

"This is not a common cause of death. It's really rare, but I've seen it happen. There are not really any warning signs," he said. "A person could dive into a swimming pool, and the temperature of the pool, being colder than the air, can set off arrhythmia."

Cardiac arrhythmia is almost always fatal, he said, unless the patient were already in an emergency room and could be defibrillated.

Native American Student Body sponsors benefit Saturday for emergency shelter

The Native American Student Body is sponsoring a benefit powwow Saturday from 2 to 11 p.m. in Ahearn Field House.

Tammy Goodson, president of the NASB, said the powwow is a benefit to help raise money for the Manhattan Emergency Shelter and April's Heritage Month.

"The Manhattan Emergency Shelter's budget got cut, and they needed extra donations," Goodson said. "The shelter approached us about having a fund-raiser."

The club is responsible for the powwow and has planned a full day of festivities.

"There is gourd dancing, a traditional Indian dance, from 2 to 5 p.m. Then everyone will break for dinner. We will then have the grand entry, the beginning of tribal dancing and intertribal dancing until 11 p.m.," Goodson said.

She also said there would be arts-and-crafts stands and numerous raffles donated from various businesses to help raise money.

"There is free admission open to the public. We don't exclude anyone from coming and spectating. All we ask is that everyone bring a non-perishable food item. We will accept any donation," she said.

In addition to supporting the shelter, Goodwin said money will also help fund Heritage Month.

"For Heritage Month we have a Native American artist, Jackie Tointigh, giving a slide show of his art at the Beach Museum on April 2," she said.

A Native American speaker will speak the next week, and the spring powwow will be on April 18, she said.

Goodwin said she looks forward to all the festivities as a chance to promote and support Native Americans.

"The mission of our group is to promote Native American culture and awareness," she said.

Entomology seminars plan to educate about insect biology, pest management

The Entomology Colloquium is an opportunity for people to hear about topics including insect biology and environmentally friendly pest management. The seminars highlight the research of faculty, students and visiting scientists.

The seminars are open to anyone, said James Nechols, professor of entomology and entomology seminar committee member.

The series, which has been conducted for more than 20 years, features speakers from universities including K-State, Purdue University, North Dakota State University, Yale University and the University of Nebraska.

Nechols said students who are not entomology majors might find some of the upcoming seminars interesting. Seminars of particular interest might be "Multimedia Authoring and Distance Education," which will be Friday and "Insects and the Konza" which will be Feb. 13.

Valerie Wright, environmental educator and naturalist for Konza Prairie Research Natural Area, will give the presentation about Konza Prairie. She said tallgrass prairie is the way Kansas used to be before people changed the land. She added that Konza is our ecosystem and is responsible for Kansas' farming economy.

She also said insects are fascinating.

"Anyone who doesn't like bugs probably just needs more information about them," she said.

Shengqiang Shu, research associate in entomology and seminar speaker, said the series is an opportunity for the department's faculty and students to present their work, while also providing an opportunity to bring speakers in.

"You can bring excellent researchers from outside the university so people can learn from them about the experience and work they've done," he said.

Never go under with the Wildcat Card

With your Wildcat Card you just can't go wrong. It has special, rounded corners that won't poke or jab. Use it to call home. Use it to eat in the Stateroom Cafeteria. The Wildcat Card's smart chip will let you buy a pop at several on-campus vending machines. Whatever you use it for, it's waterproof and it floats so you won't have to worry about ever going under. Because it's NOT a credit card, it's a debit card—there's no interest to pay.

Other safety features include ATM access to your Wildcat Checking Account with your personal identification number—which allows only you to have access to your money. And your photo prevents anyone else from using your card at a merchant. Use it on campus or around town like cash but don't worry about having the exact change—the Wildcat Card will take care of it.

Eisenhower construction to last through summer

ANDREW WIMMER
Kansas State Collegian

Faulty drainage pipes are the cause of the mud pit and construction clatter outside Eisenhower Hall.

Construction began Dec. 1 and will continue through the summer outside Eisenhower to replace the original storm sewer system. The old system was deteriorating and clogged during hard rains.

The construction project, funded by the Crumbling Classroom fund, will be completed in two phases. The first phase is scheduled to be completed by March 23, at a cost of $140,200. On Tuesday, contractors were hired for the second phase of the project, estimated to cost $94,210.

Construction will soon congest traffic at the intersection of Mid Campus Drive and Lovers Lane. The streets will not be closed, but might be limited to one lane of traffic. Once trenches have been dug and new pipes laid across Mid Campus Drive, Lovers Lane will be closed from the intersection to 100 Wilson Court, the President's Residence.

President Jon Wefald's visitors will enter from the west, said Jack Carlson, assistant to the university engineer. He said Lovers Lane is expected to be closed for a couple weeks in the latter part of February or the beginning of March.

"Hopefully, this won't affect much student traffic, but any campus street closing is going to have some effect on the students," he said. "Lovers Lane is not a main source of campus traffic."

Carlson said the repairs were needed because corrosion ate away at the pipes, causing them to collapse.

"The repairs are needed to prevent future flooding of Eisenhower Hall," he said.

Carlson said contractors have worked not to interfere with classes.

"Workers have been good about keeping the noise-level down while class is in session," he said. "They try to do jackhammering and trenching during the 10-minute break in between classes."

Todd Bennett, senior in chemical engineering, said his Spanish class meets on the third floor of Eisenhower. He said the noise is not an everyday occurrence, but it is still an annoyance.

"When the Caterpillar earth-movers rev up their engines, you can hardly hear what the teacher is saying," he said.

Carlson said several professors have complained about the noise, but the contractor has been easy to work with.

"They have been just great accommodating students and faculty," he said. "What small problems that have existed, they have done a good job of minimizing them."

Snyder among 4 selected to become Air Force ROTC honorary officers

KELLY DICKSON
Kansas State Collegian

Air Force ROTC cadets now have four men to reinforce the values and ideals their training teaches.

Football coach Bill Snyder; Peter Nicholls, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences; and Bob Cavello, the director of business services for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, were given a plaque and a detachment coin and patch. Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement, was unable to attend and will be commissioned as the Honorary Unit Admissions Officer on March 5.

The ceremony was to commission honorary officers to AFROTC detachment, and was conducted Thursday on the Ackert Hall lawn.

Col. Stan Weir, detachment commander, thanked the four men for accepting their role as mentors, positive role models and friends of the detachment.

Snyder was named the honorary commander.

"Coach Snyder is very much in line with our three ideals or values, integrity first, service before self and excellence in all we do. He is our ideals in action," Capt. Steve Dorfman said.

Nicholls was named an honorary professor of aerospace studies, and Bob Cavello became the honorary commandant of cadets. Cavello spent 9 1/2 years in the Air Force and earned the rank of captain.

The program was started this year, and the commissioning of honorary officers will occur annually. The program was instituted to bring the AFROTC program and the university closer together.

"What greater way to start integrating our program with the university," Dorfman said. "Even though we are part of the university, we are kind of not. I don't want to say outcasts, but we always seem to be the other people on campus."

The program was also established to give students role models outside of the military realm.

"We need to provide cadets with another chance to look at people with a different perspective. They see us all the time," Dorfman said.

AFROTC faces problems because its curriculum is set by the military, but it still is a department within the university. "We have to live with their world, and we have to live with our world and state requirements," Dorfman said. "This is kind of a nice way to start meshing the program and university, and to show students there is another side. The whole concept is that this is a team effort, a family effort, if you will."

The new officers' duties include speaking to the cadets once a semester about any subject the speaker thinks important. They will receive invitations to all social, military and sporting events.

Mark Williams, wing commander and senior in mechanical engineering, said the honorary officers' connection to AFROTC will benefit the wing in many ways.

"I think as far as a presence on campus, they offer a great deal of support for us. They recognize our service and dedication to the university and our country."

Williams said the four men are dedicated to their jobs in the university and will be a fine example for cadets to follow.

Trucking plan incites backlash from union

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Teamsters leader Chuck Mosqueda carefully avoided the word "boycott" Thursday when he asked union members for support in not patronizing Dillons stores about a dispute involving the grocery chain's truck drivers.

But about 450 people attending a union rally outside the Statehouse did not.

Cries of "Boycott Dillons!" rose when Mosqueda, president of Teamsters Local No. 795, told the crowd he was going to talk about Dillons.

Dillon Stores, the state's largest grocery store chain with headquarters in Hutchinson, plans to sell its trucks and contract with independent drivers.

The 135 drivers would have an opportunity to buy the trucks and contract independently with Dillons, Mosqueda said.

But the deal does not address the mechanics who work on the trucks, and drivers who buy their trucks would be without company benefits and worker's compensation.

At the rally, Mosqueda called it an example of corporate greed.

He said the union has not officially called for a boycott, but members of other unions who work at Dillons have said they would support the effort.

His request Thursday was for all union members across Kansas.

"I asked to speak to ask for your support, and it looks like I got it," he told rallyers on Thursday.

He said union members should call Dillons and say they won't shop there unless the truckers are kept as employees.

Mosqueda said the other three Dillons units in the union — warehouse, advertising and Jackson Ice Cream — voted along with the transportation unit to begin the protest.

Mosqueda said union members will hand out fliers and hold signs outside Dillons stores starting today.

Thursday's rally was to show solidarity among the various local unions, including those labor trades such as cement masons and machinists, as well as social workers and teachers.

Dennis Gaschler, Dillons spokesman, did not immediately return a phone call to The Associated Press on Thursday. But he told the Hutchinson News it is too early to know if a boycott would hurt the company financially.

There are 100,000 union households in Kansas, according to an AFL-CIO official.

Telefund volunteers, contributors deserve thanks

The KSU Foundation Telefund has, as of Thursday morning, raised $277,928 for K-State scholarships, a record-setting number in the 19-year history of the Telefund.

The Collegian would like to congratulate the students, faculty and staff who have contributed time in organizing the Telefund.

It goes without saying that the student volunteers making calls to alumni are vital to the Telefund's success. K-State alumni can identify with students who walk on the same sidewalks and use the same classrooms they did back when they were at K-State.

Likewise, without the hard work of organizers, the Telefund wouldn't be as successful as it has been thus far. The Telefund is a creative way of asking for donations that has grown significantly since its beginning 19 years ago.

That kind of growth doesn't happen without effort.

But most importantly, K-State alumni who donate money to Telefund should be thanked.

Without alumni support, scholarships for K-State students would have been less last year and the 17 years before that. Students would have missed out on an important financial resource and could have also missed out on the opportunity to become better-educated humans.

When K-State students become K-State alumni, whether it happens in May or several years from now, they should remember what the Telefund did for K-State students.

The money from Telefund makes school less expensive for students, and it seems that as time moves on, a university education only gets more expensive. Without scholarships to help pay for school, many students have been priced out of an education.

If K-State graduates can give back only one thing, the greatest thing they can give back is an education. Thanks to those who have donated to K-State students through Telefund, and thanks to those who will in the future.

FINDING PEACE FOR AMERICA'S FINEST

MARNY BURKE/Collegian

Day after day, week after week, you deal with the scum of the earth. People who have molested, raped, mugged, beaten and murdered others. They cuss and fight you if given the opportunity, and you can't understand how any human being could contemplate and commit the acts they are accused of. They contain an ingrained hatred for you, yet you know all their names better than you do the neighbors on your own street. At the end of the month, you collect your small paycheck and wonder if it's worth the hassle. To most police officers, it is not the money they risk their lives for every day. It's so good citizens don't have to deal with the scum.

To dispel popular rumors, there are no speeding ticket or DUI quotas, and officers do not get raises based upon the number of arrests they make. The police are not out to get the average citizen, and they are not looking to bust everyone. Here is a good rule — don't break the law, and you have nothing to worry about. If you do break the law, don't be upset with the police if you get caught in the act.

Police officers have emotions, too. Generally, if you treat them with respect, they will do the same. If they are serious, they have good reason to be. A police officer doesn't know who you are. Many police are killed every year in routine traffic stops.

When the officer comes to the window, leave your hands on the steering wheel and be nice. A cop is more apt to ticket someone with a bad attitude than one who is cooperative.

If you end up getting a ticket while being nice, don't blame the cop — you were probably speeding and deserve a ticket anyway.

Within every group there are a few bad apples. In every police department there are officers who probably shouldn't be cops. I have known a few, but they do not represent the majority. Unfortunately, they are the ones who get media time when they make mistakes. The problem arises in trying to identify the bad cops and dismissing them. You can't fire people unless they mess up. However, this is after they have gained national attention with their mishap and disgraced cops everywhere. Procedures to eliminate bad applicants are extensive in most departments. They include a background check, psychological evaluation, polygraph (lie-detector test) and scenario testing. Obviously, a few inadequate applicants still slip through. Don't consider them the example.

How much would you want to be paid for risking your life every day? The starting salary for a patrol officer is usually around $22,000 a year. A police officer will never get rich off the city. Most have to take extra hours in security to make ends meet. In a large city with urban problems, the salary hardly seems worth it to most people.

"Police like the power they have!" I hear this comment a lot. What power? Many people don't respect the police and continually ridicule their behavior. A cop is subject to the law like every other citizen. They do not make law and are not above them. In fact, police officers have many more restrictions than regular citizens. The power is not as complete as is the common perception.

The stress of a shift is often brought home after a day's work. "... Some junkie just fried his baby in the microwave because it was crying too loud. Would you like me to tell you about that?" — Al Pacino, "Heat."

It is difficult for police to talk about their work with their families. Some things are best left unsaid. This leaves a sense of secrecy that eventually forms a wedge in some families. This situation is amplified when undercover work is involved and total secrecy is necessary.

Most police officers are doing the best they can to provide law and order in the community. They deal with severe psychological and physical stress on a daily basis. Understand that the news media do not always represent the police force accurately as a whole. They are there for you, because it sure isn't for the money.

Be nice to our cops.

Ouster yet another method 'whiners' use for attention

Editor,

As a recent graduate of K-State, I would like to voice my opinion on the actions of the members of the Board of Student Publications who voted to remove Ron Johnson from the director's position.

During my four years on campus, I witnessed this same type of political activity (I call it whining on a little bit of a larger scale) between different organizations within K-State's student body.

I have no doubt that you can trace the roots of these people in the student government to certain common-sense proposals or attempted policy changes that have been turned down or denied for no obvious reason but for the whiners (people mentioned above) to get attention. These are probably the same people who opposed the athletic department's own effort to fund KSU Stadium expansion by saying Hale Library needed funding first. Instead of driving the stadium expansion into the ground, why didn't they organize a library fund drive?

The same goes for anything that will increase student fees. These whiners want to object to what seems like every little fee increase that goes with one of these campaigns. From my knowledge, some of these increases would have only been minimal to the individual. For example, a $5-per-semester fee increase to fund library periodicals wouldn't break anybody. If that were put into effect, the library would raise about $100,000 for periodicals which isn't a bad amount.

So back to the point, for those of you whining about comments that Ron Johnson made about a big clerical error by Student Governing Association, which resulted in a loss of money to Student Publications Inc. In the real world, such a mistake wouldn't render comments.

From my experience, Ron Johnson was one of the most influential teachers, as far as journalism, that I had during my stay at K-State. And to see him have to leave over a stupid, little issue like this would be a shame.

Alumnus regrets mistake, says it can prove beneficial

Editor,

It has come to my attention that comments I made in a letter to the Collegian concerning the University of Kansas' student newspaper might have been in error. I apologize for any inaccurate comments concerning the University Daily Kansan I might have made in my letter.

Let this be a lesson to the Board of Student Publications; acknowledge your mistakes and make every effort to correct them.

Sincerely,

'Kansan' official cites, corrects misconceptions of procedures

Editor,

In the news business, we are required to check our facts and research thoroughly before we write. If we are writing opinion, we must make sure that we back it up, no matter how strong our feelings.

Although David Frese is a former editor of the Collegian and now works for the Kansas City Star, his comments in yesterday's Collegian do not live up to these minimal expectations for journalists.

He writes, "Student journalists at the University of Kansas get to work at the University Daily Kansan a semester and a half. Tops." Where did this come from? I'm baffled because it is completely fictional. There are no limits to how many semesters a student can work at the Kansan.

He continues, "The whole time the students work on the newspaper at Kansas, they're overseen by some administrative lackey who's probably less interested in the truth than he or she is interested in getting the university's spin out to the reading public."

Tom Eblen, a former city editor at the paper where Frese now works, is the Kansan's faculty adviser. He sits in an office across the hall from the newsroom and gives advice. He approves expense reports, posts a daily critique of the paper and is the newspaper's representative to the faculty. He plays absolutely no role in the daily production of the Kansan. Students, and students only, assign stories, decide where to place stories, determine editorial content, coordinate art and supervise the flow of copy in the newsroom.

Without trying to sound rude, it is obvious that Frese had absolutely no idea what he was talking about.

It is unfortunate that someone with such apparent credibility to K-State readers would portray a false image of the University Daily Kansan.

Service with a smile

From turning around frozen foods to checking, bagging, those who work at supermarket carry out bagful of stories

Maybe you didn't know it, but I've been serving you since 1997. Or at least that's what my Dillons name tag says. And don't worry — I kind of like serving you.

My first job at Dillons was that of the frozen-food facer. Five days a week for the better part of the summer, I was in the frozen-food aisles at 6 a.m., making sure the hash browns and Lean Cuisines all were facing the same direction. The best part was when I realized the frozen bull testicles had expired. It took me a while to bring myself to say, "Look, those testes really need to go. I don't know if you ship those things back or what, but they're totally expired."

And I even got to wear gloves. I've moved up since then, having acquired the title of checker/courtesy clerk. That's right — I'm so versatile, they don't know where to stick me. However, each duty has its own secret perks.

Being a checker can be very educational. For example, one time a man came through the express line to purchase a small container of frozen pork brains. I asked him what one does with pork brains, and he replied, "I'm gonna eat them. What did you think I was gonna do? Look at them? I just fry them up in some egg yolk."

See, before then I'd been frying my pork brains up in the remains from the sac of fluid around the brain. Boy, I sure felt the fool.

Bagging customers' groceries also has rewards all its own. Everyone who purchased a turkey during the holiday season most likely got to hear the rip-roaring story about how my mom cooked our turkey in the microwave one year.

Plus, the courtesy clerk (or carry-out in slang) has the opportunity to learn every possible bag combination. Sure, it seems like a simple question, "Is a plastic bag OK?" But it really is laced with hidden meaning, causing the customer to 1. ignore the question altogether, 2. ponder the question for several minutes, or 3. say "No, it is not" in such a vehement manner, one would think you asked them if you could lick every item they bought.

Most people are content with plastic. I'm content with plastic. Let the world rejoice. Some people want paper. That's fine, and we'll just ignore the fact that because the bags are taller than I am, I usually end up with bloody paper cuts on my arms. Some people, God bless them, like to have a paper bag with a plastic bag on the outside. Others just like to have their children watch you to make sure you're not putting their ham hocks on top of the bread. (We really did watch videos to learn how to sack, and it really stressed the whole bread-on-top issue.)

The customers are usually nice people who are happy when asked if they found everything they needed. I'm a customer. I'm happy. Then there's that 2 percent or so who just seem to enjoy being rude. These people include those who don't put the divider thing between orders then yell at the cashier when it gets rung up with someone else's groceries, and people who insist on using the express lane for their 10,000 items.

Like any other job, it's good and it's bad. However, the bad sometimes isn't so bad because of the other people who work at Dillons. Never have I worked with a nicer bunch of people. After I get yelled at by a customer for something, it's always nice to find out another checker has also been yelled at before for the same thing. What can I say? It's hard not to take things personally now and then. Prick me, and do I not bleed?

When I'm not actually at work, I realize that I truly like my job. Now, I'm not saying every day's like a great big drunken party there on Sarber Lane, but I could have it worse. Where else could I observe such human habits as the inability to buy condoms without an obligatory purchase of at least two neutral items, like a can of coffee and a Twix bar?

Parent criticizes lessons from 'Railroading 101'

Editor,

Based on the dismissal of Ron Johnson, I should thank the Board of Student Publications and K-State for the invaluable education passed down to my son and daughter who are K-State students.

At least I am assured of their well-rounded education now because they have seen the hard, cold realities in Railroading 101. It is unfortunate that these experiences exist in today's business society, but it is a learned experience, and the actions of Student Publications Inc. enforce its ideology to have the students carry on this behavior in their future life experiences.

When they enter the corporate world, they will carry with them the lessons learned in Railroading 101. I won't get into the messages of life that are portrayed in this incident, that is better left to be formulated in the mind of the individual. It will open their eyes and become part of who they are and what they become. It is my hope that they never go down the path taken by certain board members. The lesson has been served.

On a personal note, I have had dealings with Ron Johnson and found him to be a very compassionate, caring and attentive human being. He was my first contact with K-State, and I found him to be an excellent representative of the university and a good person — a person I respect and know my children do also. His final lesson as a result of the actions of the board is an invaluable education for all. I know he will hold his head high, and my children will keep their eyes open.

N.Y. newspaper adviser finds fault with decision

Editor,

Like many around the country who read the story "Student Publications Board Terminates Director's Office" in your on-line edition Thursday, I was disturbed to learn of the actions that have jeopardized, and possibly initiated the end of, Ron Johnson's role as director of Student Publications Inc. at K-State.

I have known Johnson for several years as a member of College Media Advisers and have often benefited from his experience, wisdom and advice. As an outsider, I am not in a position to fully understand or make judgments on the Byzantine political machinations of your publications board.

But this should be said, and cannot be said too strongly or too many times: Ron Johnson is one of the most knowledgeable and most dedicated college media professionals in the country. K-State is lucky to have him, and those concerned with the quality of student media there should do everything in their power to keep him.

Alumnus slams action, says board lacks spine

Editor,

As a K-State alumnus and longtime Collegian staff member, I am shocked and outraged by recent actions of the Board of Student Publications. That members of student government are intimidated by free and independent journalism on campus is not surprising. They fear accountability like most aspiring politicians do. But that the board should bend to pressure from other student government bodies to dismiss such a fine director as Ron Johnson should alarm any person who advocates free speech and accountable student government.

That the board voted merely to vacate Johnson's position rather than fire him after due process is proof positive that certain members of the board lack the spine to confront Ron with their concerns directly, in spite of the fact that Ron has always been open to criticism and input from others.

They allowed a personal matter to become a personnel matter. If they're this cowardly about Ron, then they surely lack the moxie it takes to keep student journalism free of student government interference, as it should be.

Now the chickens have come home to roost in the form of Carlton Getz, student senator and board member, who can vote to fire the director of Student Senate's most-visible source of criticism on campus (the Collegian) and lobby five other board members successfully to do the same.

Unless this trend is reversed by leadership on the part of the board, look for the Collegian, consistently one of America's best daily college newspapers, to devolve into the public relations rag for Student Senate, the admissions office and the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

A good step in the direction of leadership would be to vote to reinstate Ron Johnson as director of Student Publications Inc. In addition, the student body should never re-elect Julie Strickland, Jay Witt, Carlton Getz or Jason Ellis to the Board of Student Publications.

Cats to battle in-state rival Kansas

DAN MERKER
Kansas State Collegian

Even though the K-State women's basketball team is in the middle of a three-game losing streak, the Wildcats are ready to battle their biggest rivals — the Kansas Jayhawks. The teams will battle at 1 p.m. Saturday in Allen Fieldhouse in Lawrence.

Kansas, 14-5 and 6-3 in Big 12 play, comes into Saturday afternoon's game playing well. The Jayhawks beat Colorado 65-45 Wednesday night in Boulder, Colo., gaining their second road win of the season.

KU has lost only twice in its past eight games, with both losses to top-10 teams. The Hawks narrowly missed beating No. 8 Arizona in Tucson last Saturday, losing 67-62.

The Cats come in to the game on a downswing. Each of their past two games has been a close loss. Last Saturday, the Cats fell to the Buffaloes in Colorado 56-52 after leading much of the game. Wednesday night, K-State lost to Oklahoma 69-67 after a pair of last-second shots to tie the game were no good.

The loss to Oklahoma dropped K-State's record to 9-10, the first time the Cats have been below .500 all season. The Cats have a 3-6 Big 12 mark and are only 1 1/2 games out of last place in the conference.

But because this game is the KU game, records don't matter a whole bunch. In each squad's second conference game of the season, K-State handed the Jayhawks a 53-47 loss in Bramlage Coliseum. That game made KU 0-2 in the Big 12, but the Hawks have recovered to win six of their past seven conference games.

K-State head coach Deb Patterson said the KU loss to K-State was the turning point in the Hawks' season.

"After the loss to us, they went on a win streak," Patterson said. "It was a point in their season where they made a change."

Scoring will not be easy for the Cats. K-State is last in the Big 12 in scoring, by nearly three points per game, and Kansas is tops in the conference, keeping its opponents to 36.3-percent shooting. The Hawks are also tops in blocked shots, averaging five per game.

The Hawks are led by Suzi Raymont and Lynn Pride, both of whom average more than 14 points per game. The Cats will have to guard KU better from beyond the three-point line than they did the Sooners on Wednesday. Oklahoma sunk eight three-pointers against the Cats on the way to victory. Raymont is second in three-point percentage in the conference, behind only K-State's Kim Woodlee.

K-State kept each of KU's top players to relatively poor games in their first meeting of the year. They combined for only 13 points, but Patterson thinks they will step up Saturday.

"Lynn Pride's going to want to make up for an average night at Bramlage," Patterson said. "I think the same thing of Raymont. I think we have to have a good, solid all-around effort."

Tennis team to dual with Wichita State

DAN CATALDI
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State women's tennis team, ranked No. 60 in the nation, is set to do battle with the Wichita State Shockers this Saturday in Wichita. The meet is scheduled for 6 p.m. at the Wichita Racquet Club.

The Wildcats are coming off an impressive season opening with a 9-0 sweep over the Southwest Missouri State Lady Bears.

However, this match should prove to be a tougher challenge for the Cats.

"It's a better test for everyone on our team," K-State Coach Steve Bietau said.

"They are always one of the best teams in the Missouri Valley Conference."

This year the Shockers have two of the top 15 doubles teams in the International Tennis Association's Central Region rankings.

They are led by the No. 10 team of Alison Passmore and Jane White. This pair will likely match up with the No. 3 team in the Central Region of Yana Dorodnova and Eva Novotná. This Cat duo is ranked No. 37 in the nation.

At No. 2 doubles, the Shockers have the No. 14 team in the Central Region of Lisa Field and Annette Hartman. They will likely face the Cats' tandem of Lena Pilipchak and Anna Pampoulova.

In singles play, Dorodnova, ranked No.

11 in the Central region, will face the No. 13 Field at the top spot.

Bietau said he plans on running a similar lineup to the one that beat Southwest Missouri State. The two other Cats ranked in the top 20, Pilipchak at No. 17 and No. 18 Pampoulova, will likely round out the top three spots for the meet.

"Their top three players are very dangerous in singles," Bietau said.

Field has beaten Dorodnova in the past, and Pilipchak has split in her two meetings with White. Bietau said Hartman, who rounds out the Shockers' top three, is also very strong.

The Cats have spent the past two weeks since their sweep of Southwest Missouri State preparing for this match. Little things in each player's game have concerned Coach Bietau the most. These individual problems have been the focus of recent practices.

However, sickness has been a problem in the preparation.

"We have been working on a lot of little things for each individual," Bietau said. "Girls have been in and out of practice for the last week battling illness."

The goal of this weekend's meet for the Cats is to judge their level of play against a good team.

"We want to see what kind of progress we have made since the last meet," Bietau said. "We need to get in a situation where we're tested more to see some things. This match could give us that opportunity."

Community college recruits predicted to have strong, immediate effect

JOEL WHITE
Kansas State Collegian

K-State football didn't sign every recruit it was hoping to sign in the ninth recruiting class of the Bill Snyder era.

Nonetheless, Snyder said he was pleased with the talented athletes the Wildcats were able to sign.

"In regards to the youngsters that we do have committed to our program, I'm extremely happy," Snyder said. "I think we have some very fine young men, and I think we have some very fine players, talented players."

Snyder said it will be difficult to evaluate the Cats' 1998 recruiting class for two or three years because most of the class will not step into playing time right away.

"Sometimes they get the impression they'll be able to step in and play right now, but when your program reaches a certain level that doesn't happen very often," he said.

There are a few exceptions to that rule. The most notable exception is the national community college player of the year, Frank Murphy, and Quincy Morgan, who has the ability to play right away for the Cats at running back, Snyder said.

"Frank obviously has been a very, very fine player, and he has an opportunity to help us become better, an opportunity to play immediately, and Quincy probably the same thing," he said.

Murphy, who is enrolled at K-State this semester, played at Garden City Community College last fall where he earned first team All-America honors. He transferred to GCCC and redshirted the 1996 season after playing a year at Itawamba Community College.

Snyder said Murphy's speed, 4.26 seconds in the 40-yard dash, will be a great addition to the Cats' backfield.

"Everything is second-hand information at this point in time. We haven't had him under a clock in the time that he's been here, we'll do that at some point in time," Snyder said. "I would suggest that he probably brings more speed to that position than what we have been accustomed to."

Morgan, another community college recruit, should be able to contribute immediately on the offensive side of the ball, Snyder said.

A wide receiver and teammate of Michael Bishop at Blinn Community College in Texas, Morgan had 38 receptions for 645 yards and eight touchdowns for Blinn in 1997.

The other two community college recruits, cornerback DeRon Tyler and defensive end Matthew Childers, will also compete for playing time immediately.

The Cats added two more cornerbacks to the already loaded position with the signing of high school players Dale Hall and Terence Newman.

Hall, from Southridge High School in Miami, was listed as one of Florida's top-two high school cornerbacks by many recruiting publications.

Newman, from Central High School in Salina, had verbally committed to the University of Kansas, but was swayed to sign with the Cats.

"Our intentions are that we want him to play at cornerback," Snyder said. "The thing that interests us in him is the speed that he has coupled with the size that he brings."

The Cats signed four offensive linemen, including Thomas Barnett — a walk-on red-shirt freshman during the 1997 season.

Snyder said Barnett, from Millwood High School in Oklahoma City, was able to earn a scholarship because of the progress he made throughout the 1997 season.

"He's worked hard enough, developed himself well enough and has become prominent enough in what we do on our offense that we think he's going to be a strong contributing factor in our offense, and consequently has earned a scholarship," Snyder said.

Hype surrounding Winter Olympics will make life as a student nearly impossible

In life, we all have to make decisions. Now is the time for an important one for me.

Tonight, the opening ceremony of the 1998 Winter Olympics will take place in Nagano, Japan, and my life will be quite difficult for a few weeks.

See, I live for the Winter Olympics. Even more than the Stanley Cup Playoffs. At least those are in the summer, when I don't have to worry about classes getting in the way of the important stuff in life like hockey.

This year, the hockey competition will be better and more enjoyable to watch than ever before. For the first time, NHL players will play in the Olympics.

The NHL will stop its season after tomorrow for a while so its players can compete in Nagano, and the world will be treated to perhaps the best hockey ever played.

Instead of rooting for players we've never heard of before, simply because they're wearing the good ol' red, white and blue, people all around the United States — and the world for that matter — will be rooting for their favorite players with more conviction than ever before because they're playing for their countries.

The fact that players are playing for their countries will make the players play like it's the Stanley Cup Final. The best players from all over the world will be playing for their home countries, and the competition will be better than ever before.

We might not have a gold medal game go down to a shootout like in 1994 when Canada's Paul Kariya was stopped by Sweden's Tommy Salo to give the Swedes the win, but overall, the competition will be better than ever.

One thing is certain — there will be no "Miracle on Ice" like in 1980, when a severe underdog American team beat the seemingly unstoppable Soviets in the semifinals on its way to a gold in Lake Placid, New York. This year, for the first time since the 1980 Games, the Yanks are favored, with Canada, to win gold.

If all goes as expected, the two teams will meet in the gold medal game, and a great game it should be. However, good teams should be fielded by the Russians, Swedes, Czechs and Finns.

It would be a rematch of the 1996 World Cup of Hockey finals series, a best-of-three event in which the Americans rallied in the final five minutes to come from behind to win the Cup. This was among the finest hockey games I've ever seen, and Tony Amonte should be a national hero in the United States like Paul Henderson still is in Canada, more than 25 years after his winning goal in the 1972 Summit Series between the Canadians and Soviets.

But he's not because the goal was not on a grand scale of, say, the Olympics. This is the time for the Americans to shine on the big stage and put hockey in the mindset of the American public along with football, baseball and basketball.

Watch closely. It will be worth the time.

Other events will be worth watching as well. Women's hockey is a medal sport for the first time, and the excitement of the bobsled, luge, skiing, figure skating and plenty of other events will make it a great two weeks.

The only problem will be the time of the events. Since they are being played halfway around the world, the times will be torturous on us here in the United States.

I must catch every game live if possible. Otherwise, it's not the same. You'll know the game has already been decided, and in the information age, the outcome of the events will be known before broadcast.

The problem is class. If there is live television, I will be obligated to watch all night long. If the games are on during the day, I will have to watch them. What about class? I'll have to play it by ear, weighing various factors to make my decision.

Unfortunately, I have chosen a tough field of study that requires more than simply going to class. Homework. Some can be done while watching the Olympics, but knowing myself, there will be a lot more watching than working going on.

There's only one solution. President Jon Wefald needs to flex his executive muscles. Please take the best interest of the university, or at least me, into account and cancel classes for the next two weeks. The NHL has an Olympic break, why shouldn't we?

That way, I'll be happy as a clam and can still be a responsible student, like we all should be. It's best for all involved.

I know one thing. In 2002, I'll be in Salt Lake City, taking two weeks away from everything to enjoy every second of the Olympics and live the rest of life in debt as a result.

Prague Chamber Orchestra features young virtuosos on piano, trumpet

CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

For its 13th North American tour, the internationally acclaimed Prague Chamber Orchestra is making a stop at K-State.

The orchestra, with a total of 36 members, is scheduled to perform at 8 tonight in McCain Auditorium.

"The Prague Chamber Orchestra has the best reputation of small orchestral ensembles I've ever seen," Richard Martin, director of McCain Auditorium, said.

"I'm always excited when we have a group like this," David Frain, assistant director of McCain, said.

The tour features two soloists who, at young ages, have received rave reviews — 27-year-old Valentina Lisitsa on piano and 20-year-old Sergei Nakariakov on trumpet. Lisitsa has two newly released compact discs, while Nakariakov has four.

"We get a chance to hear two fine soloists," said Martin, who heard the orchestra perform when he worked at Penn State several years ago.

Martin said it is important that groups such as the Prague Chamber Orchestra connect with the audience.

"There should be something you take away from the performance," he said.

"When we put the programs together, our goal is to make something that gives the audience a satisfying experience."

Martin said through groups like the Prague Chamber Orchestra, he hopes to expose students to a wide variety of the arts.

"I believe it is vital for K-State students to experience a broad range of the performing arts," Martin said. "We're going to shoot for the very best we can afford."

Omaha Theater Company for Young People to present 'Frog and Toad' this weekend

CHARLE SIOUX CHARLETON
Kansas State Collegian

The Omaha Theater Company for Young People presents "Frog and Toad are Friends" at 3 p.m. Sunday in McCain Auditorium.

More info?

Tickets for the performance are $12 for the general public, $10 for seniors and $6 for students and children. To order tickets for "Frog and Toad are Friends," stop by the box office at McCain, noon to six p.m., Monday through Friday, or call 532-6428.

The play, as adapted by Karen Abbott, brings to life the award-winning stories written by Arnold Lobel. The audience learns about fun and friendship as Frog and Toad are joined on stage by their friends Snail, Turtle and Mouse. The friends lead one another through a series of small adventures, involving preparing for a surprise birthday party, laughing at a funny swimsuit and learning to fly a kite.

"The play is based on a popular series of young people's books by an award-winning illustrator," Richard Martin, McCain director, said. "It will give some older folks a chance to relive childhood memories."

Martin said the Omaha Theater Company is one of the oldest and largest children's theaters.

The performance is recommended for elementary age children — and adults of all ages.

"If you don't have a child of your own, borrow one and come," Martin said. "It's a good family outing."

The Omaha Theater Company premiered their adaptation of the stories in spring 1997 at the Rose Blumkin Performing Arts Center, a renovated 1927 vaudeville theater in Omaha.

The Ford Motor Company Fund subsidized the tour of "Frog and Toad are Friends." Financing for "Frog and Toad are Friends" comes about through the Alan and Karen Bell Endowment for the Performing Arts, the Kansas Arts Commission and the National Endowment for the Arts. The K-State Fine Arts Fee contributed additional funding.

Tula's Out of Bounds Sports Bar to provide change in atmosphere

WYNN DALTON
Kansas State Collegian

Tubby's Bar & Grill is now Tula's Out of Bounds Sports Bar and Grill.

Tula Ritthisorn, a December 1997 K-State graduate, purchased the business on Jan. 8 from Billy Porter and Mike Trout. Ritthisorn owns the new business with Monty and Kathy Williams of Manhattan.

Ritthisorn said he has changed the emphasis from dance to sports.

"Now it's more of a sports bar. A place to relax, play a few games and watch a little TV," he said.

Ritthisorn said he expects Tula's Out of Bounds to receive its liquor license today. As the business grows, Ritthisorn said he hopes to make the bar more than just the average beer joint, serving frozen and specialty drinks, as well.

"I think once we get our liquor license, we'll be doing well. Then we can take credit cards and serve drinks. Things will really pick up then," bartender Tamara Bourgeois said.

Not only can customers still enjoy a game of pool or darts, they can watch a game on Tula's new big-screen television. Ritthisorn said he hopes to show programming events such as NCAA basketball playoffs in the spring and football games in the fall. Ritthisorn has also added a golf putting game that he said is the only one in town.

"People can just come in and just relax with friends and have drinks and really have no pressure for them to be somebody else. You know — just sit back and relax," Ritthisorn said.

Customers said they enjoy the change in atmosphere.

"I like Tula's. It's a place I can go to kick back and relax. You don't have to hassle with the dance floor like at other places, and the crowd's a little older. It's just a cool place to hang out," said Amy Mitchell, senior in speech pathology and audiology.

Dylan Spencer, senior in education, said he agreed.

"It's a nice relaxed atmosphere. It reminds me a lot of the old Champions that used to be here. It's nice to be able to sit and enjoy a beer."

Ritthisorn said he values his customers and his time with them.

"Going out and mingling with the customers is the most rewarding thing about this business for me," he said. "It just gives me pleasure to know that the customers are happy."

Ritthisorn said his experience as manager of Applebee's taught him valuable lessons about how to treat employees.

"We're going to differentiate ourselves by the way we treat our employees, because they are our most valuable asset. I'm going to treat them with respect and try to take care of them," he said. "I want our employees to be able to take care of any situation at any given time to better serve the customer without having to go through management."

"That way customers are taken care of right away, and we'll give the better service," he said.

► New sports bar in town
Tula's is open from 3 p.m. to 2 a.m. Monday through Friday and from noon to 2 a.m. Saturday and Sunday. The business serves basic bar food and appetizers.

The Cryptoquip is a substitution cipher in which one letter stands for another. If you think that X equals O, it will equal O throughout the puzzle. Single letters, short words and words using an apostrophe give you clues to locating vowels. Solution is by trial and error.

WATER WORKOUT

Aqua aerobics class offers exercise with less stress on bones, joints

WYNN DALTON
Kansas State Collegian

Water jogging classes and aqua aerobics are just a couple of the exercising opportunities offered at the Natatorium.

"Aqua aerobics is a high-intensity workout," Aqua Aerobics Instructor Serina McEntire, senior in kinesiology, said. "Depending on the instructor, we do 30 minutes of cardiovascular work, 10 to 20 minutes of toning with delta-bells or flotation devices and 10 minutes of stretching."

McEntire said this type of workout contributes less stress to bones and joints.

"It's a great workout because of the resistance the water gives and with little stress on the joints and bones. It's a nice way to get a workout," she said.

Participants said they agreed.

"I think it makes me more energized and feel more healthy," Shannon Brandt, junior in elementary education, said. "It's a good overall workout, and doesn't make you sore. It tones all of your major muscle areas."

Michelle Daniels, sophomore in elementary education, said she didn't really consider water aerobics to be work.

"You don't really realize you're working out. It's more the atmosphere," she said. "It's more fun than work."

Assistant Director of Recreational Services Robin Leaper said offerings at the Natatorium work well with the overall mission of Recreational Services.

"These classes go along with Rec Services as a whole in achieving a person's overall wellness, tied in with school work and the five aspects of wellness: spiritual, social, intellectual, emotional and physical," Leaper said.

She said the classes are the two most well-attended.

"Water aerobics and the aqua jogging are probably two of the most popular activities that we have over there," Leaper said.

Students, faculty and staff, members of the KSU Alumni Association and other authorized users may attend class at no additional charge with valid IDs.

Additional offerings at the Natatorium are sponsored by the Department of Kinesiology and through UFM and Continuing Education. The Department of Kinesiology offers Swimming I and Fitness Swimming for credit. Water Fitness Instruction Certification is sponsored by UFM.

Wet & wild water works

Recreational Services sponsors aqua aerobics on Monday, Wednesday and Thursday at noon and on Monday and Tuesday at 7:30 p.m. Deep Water Jogging meets on Wednesday at 7:30 p.m.

Expectations for 'Great Expectations' left unfulfilled despite talented actors

DIANA LEE
Kansas State Collegian

One might expect a cast of today's hottest actors, oozing with talent, to produce a masterpiece of a performance. In the case of "Great Expectations," the only thing oozing is cheese.

In the story, Finn (Ethan Hawke) falls in love with Estella (Gwyneth Paltrow), at the tender age of 10. This is the first place the movie makes an unbelievable claim it can't back up.

The two are standing beside a fountain in Estella's aunt's home. She takes a drink from the fountain and invites him to do the same. As he does, she boldly shoves her tongue down his throat and they share something like a first kiss. How many 10-year-olds are there who would even consider the possibility of French kissing another person?

We then jump forward to a time when the two are all grown up, but still spending time together under Estella's crazy aunt's supervision.

One moment Estella is standing there casually rubbing her leg up and down Finn's thigh. The next she strolls away and out of his life.

I suppose at this point we are supposed to feel Finn's loss as the love of his life leaves him. It just doesn't work. She has treated him like trash from the first moment they met. We can only hope he will move on with his life. I mean, who needs a relationship like that one?

We're not so lucky. Through an odd turn of events, their paths cross again. Only this time, they take things even further and she steps all over him even more harshly. One can only wonder if this man is a glutton for punishment or just really pathetic.

Now, Finn does start to find some reward in his life when his art becomes successful. Of course, the film turns this into one of the cheesiest moments when, not once, but twice, we hear this annoying Iggy Pop tune screaming something about "here comes success" over and over again. Please, just give it a rest.

Simply put, this film tried too hard. It jammed too much story into too small of a space of time. It tried to force its audience to feel emotions the plot didn't back up. There were an uncountable number of over-dramatic scenes that had no basis.

The film would have done well to balance its melodrama with some substance and a plot.

In order to keep people from attending this flick if they feel they must, I have tried not to ruin the story. Of course, it was pretty bad to begin with.

Professor to spend year writing book

CHRISTINA HAUCK, ASSISTANT PROFESSOR OF ENGLISH, WILL SPEND THE NEXT YEAR RESEARCHING AND WRITING A BOOK THROUGH A FELLOWSHIP FOR COLLEGE TEACHERS AND INDEPENDENT SCHOLARS FROM THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES.

CLAUDETTE RILEY
Kansas State Collegian

The overlooked and less-successful literary works of a popular British woman who wrote the first sex manual are being investigated by a K-State professor.

Christina Hauck, assistant professor of English, said she became familiar with the work of Marie Stopes while working on her dissertation "Birth Control and the 'Birth' of Modernism."

Hauck will spend the next year researching and writing her book "The Fictions of Pleasure: The Literary Oeuvre of Marie Stopes," funded through a Fellowship for College Teachers and Independent Scholars from the National Endowment for the Humanities.

"I just think she's so cool and interesting," Hauck said. "I think we are grappling with many of the same issues today."

The issues Stopes dealt with in her writing included the advocacy of birth control and contraceptive techniques.

"Married Life," Stopes' most popular work, was a sex manual published in 1918. Before Stopes' death in 1958, it sold more than 1 million copies and was published in several languages.

"It's a really curious book because on one hand, it's really graphic. She uses words like penis, vagina and clitoris and then, other parts are very soft and idyllic,"

Hauck said. "She mixes precise, scientific language with the language of a romance novel."

Hauck said Stopes' position as a white, middle-class woman with good scientific credentials contributed to her success and the acceptance of the manual.

"The fact that she was a woman did make a difference," Hauck said. "It's interesting that graphic language in a novel is considered obscene, but in a scientific text, it's acceptable."

The success of her uncensored sex manual and a contraceptive guide, "Wide Parenthood," made Stopes a respected author and her advice was sought on sexual matters.

"It made it safer for people to approach her. Tens of thousands of people wrote her letters," Hauck said. "People were hungry for this information."

Stopes' sex manual is important, but Hauck said three-quarters of her new book will focus on the author's less successful plays, poetry and novels.

Hauck said Stopes was more careful with her non-literary text "Married Love" and might have benefited from writing more explicitly in her fiction.

"She also made herself unpopular in the same way that women who have drive, power and have a vision they want to see accomplished are unpopular," Hauck said. "No one calls Winston Churchill pushy."

With a background in 20th-century British literature, Hauck said she's interested in exploring the relationship between sexuality and reproduction, especially within feminist scholarship.

"I want to continue to explore issues of reproductive controls and modernism within a larger context of writers from the same period," Hauck said. "Even though Stopes got written out of history, she dealt with some of the same struggles feminists are seeing today."

Hauck said she believes investigating the contributions of overlooked women can lead to discussion about the damaging effects of sexism.

"This is revisionist history. History is written by the victors and many women, who made significant contributions, have been written out of history," Hauck said. "It's a cliché but if we don't learn from history, we are doomed to repeat it."

Traveling to England to conduct research on Stopes with University Small Research Grants, Hauck has been able to find obscure writing from Stopes including correspondence and a manuscript.

After Hauck earned masters and doctoral degrees from the University of California at Berkeley, she joined K-State in 1994. She had already been awarded a Mellon Dissertation Fellowship and an Outstanding Graduate Student Instructor Award.

Program transforms unwanted textbooks into building blocks to create 'Bridge to Asia'

KELLY REDDING
Kansas State Collegian

When Jessica Raile's textbooks were not bought back after finals last semester, she decided to give them away. "Since I'm from New York, I had books that I couldn't sell back here," Raile, sophomore in human ecology, said. "It would have been a shame to just get rid of them."

After speaking to her brother, a student at Cornell University, Raile learned of the Bridge To Asia program.

Bridge to Asia is a nonprofit organization that collects books from schools and sends them to China and Southeast Asia.

"I believe that books are knowledge, and they don't have many books for students over there," Raile said. "There are no tools to learn with."

Raile decided that she wanted to try out the Bridge program at K-State and enlisted the help of Jay Johnson, senior in mechanical engineering and pre-law.

They submitted the idea of the program to the Academic Affairs Committee and then went to the K-State Union Bookstore.

Carrie Mitchell, book division manager of the bookstore said she was glad to help in the effort.

"What a wonderful opportunity this was," she said. "And it's amazing how many books they collected for only having a box at the end of our buy-back table."

With only a small poster for publicity, the Bridge to Asia program collected nearly 400 books last semester. The books that weren't usable, such as American history books and religion books, were sent to libraries.

The remaining 10 boxes of books were shipped to the Chicago drop point and then sent to Asia.

"I think that the ultimate goal is to get the other Kansas schools involved so that we can have a joint effort," Mitchell said. "If 10,000 books are collected, then the Bridge to Asia program pays for all the freight."

Jeffrey Smith, president of the Bridge to Asia program, said the K-State program was the first to be started by students.

"We are amazed," he said. "This is the first time students have initiated, in a systematic way, a program to involve the entire university to collect books for Third World countries."

Smith also said he was impressed by how quickly the program had been implemented.

"By the time we heard about it, the program had already been planned out with a genuine interest. Kansas State University has the potential to be a national model," he said.

Action would allow Iraq to sell more oil

ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — Britain, Portugal and Sweden circulated a resolution in the Security Council on Thursday to increase the amount of oil Iraq can sell to buy food and medicine for its 22 million people. Iraq rejected key elements of the proposal.

The resolution would implement a recommendation by Secretary-General Kofi Annan to allow Iraq to sell $5.2 billion worth of oil over six months.

Under the current ceiling, Iraq is limited to $2.14 billion worth of exports. Most of the money goes to buy food and medicine for distribution under U.N. monitoring. The rest goes to compensate victims of the 1991 Persian Gulf War and pay expenses for U.N. weapons monitors in Iraq.

Annan's recommendation also provides for a one-time expenditure of $1 billion to repair Iraqi infrastructure damaged by U.S. forces during the Gulf conflict.

U.N. spokesman Fred Eckhard said the 15-member council would probably begin discussions on the plan Monday.

But Iraqi Foreign Minister Mohammed Said al-Sahhaf rejected several elements of the plan.

In a letter to Annan on Thursday, he said Iraq is not willing to pay more for U.N. monitoring and is not willing to repair electric power stations in northern Iraq, which is not fully under Baghdad's control. He said repairs should be nationwide.

The government also opposes plans for U.N. humanitarian agencies to target aid to vulnerable groups like children and the poor, saying Iraq — not the United Nations — should be responsible for such aid.

He also objected to plans to divert more funds to U.N. administration, saying increases should be used to buy more food and medicine.

Some 4.4 million tons of food have been distributed among Iraqis under the U.N. oil-for-food program, about 257 pounds of food for each Iraqi since the program's inception in December 1996.

However, U.N. officials have repeatedly said the program is inadequate to meet all of Iraq's humanitarian needs. The U.N. children's agency has reported widespread malnutrition among Iraqi children.

The U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, Bill Richardson, said Washington supports Annan's recommendation in principle. But Richardson added, "We are going to try to shape it to make the U.N. a little more accountable."

U.S. diplomats, speaking on condition of anonymity, said that while Washington was generally supportive of Annan's plan, the large increase raised some questions.

It was uncertain whether U.S. reservations would be enough to block quick approval of the resolution, especially since it is cosponsored by Britain.

Britain has stood firmly with the United States on the issue of access of U.N. inspectors to all suspected weapons sites. Washington needs British support as the council grapples with the weapons crisis.

Iraq has been banned from freely exporting oil since its August 1990 invasion of neighboring Kuwait.

After a U.S.-led coalition drove the Iraqis from Kuwait, the Security Council decided to maintain the sanctions until Baghdad complied with orders to destroy long-range missiles and weapons of mass destruction.

home winning streak, No. 13 New Mexico, pulled out a 77-74 game in the last four seconds vs. favored No. 3 Utah. Undeclared No. 5 Stanford lost big at home to No. 6 Arizona, 93-75. And Florida upset No. 7 Kentucky 86-78.

Big 12 home-victory success contributes to the tight race in the conference. The league now stands at 37-13 (.740) at home. Three of those five victories were decided by a total of six points — Colorado at Texas A&M (68-67), Oklahoma at Baylor (61-60) and Oklahoma State at Oklahoma (88-84).

Asbury said except for Kansas and Texas A&M — No. 1 and No. 12, respectively, in the Big 12, any team could end up anywhere.

"It's surprising to me that Oklahoma got a couple of wins on the road," he said. "Giving them due credit, I don't see them as the clear-cut, second-best team in the conference. I don't think they're any better than we are or the other nine teams battling for position."

The battle's too intense to be watched closely at this point, Asbury said. He said his team is only focusing on one goal at a time — the first one defeating Nebraska.

"I don't feel comfortable enough with our position to worry about who's winning in the conference," he said. "We need a couple of road wins, and obviously, that would be No. 1 and 2 for us."

Airport captures small share of local travel market

JAMI BOYLES
Kansas State Collegian

Manhattan Regional Airport is not living up to its potential, according to an air-service analysis done during the past year.

"All we're capturing right now is about 13 to 14 percent of the market," Kenneth Black, airport director, said. "We're missing out on an enormous part of the market share."

Black said he was able to convince the Manhattan City Commission to hire a consulting firm for $28,000 in fall 1996.

The consulting firm tracked flights of travelers in the airport's seven-county area around Manhattan, flight records and methods, the firm studied the airlines' potential customers were using.

According to the results, people accounted for about 152,000 enplanements, last year.

Only 23,000 of those boardings at the Manhattan Regional Airport, Black said.

Airport Advisory Board member Hayter said the airport is facing problems. The cost and number of flights offered are two obstacles, he said.

The third involves US Airways Express, the airport's only commercial carrier.

US Airways Express doesn't travel through prominent air-traffic hubs, Black said. Manhattan needs an airline that does.

Black said he was going to offer US Airways Express about offering more destinations than Kansas City.

which is not considered a prominent hub.

"They have indicated some interest in doing that," he said. "It opens up more opportunities for the customer."

US Airways' business at Manhattan's airport isn't bad, Black said.

"Even with just 13 to 14 percent of the market, it's a very good operation for them," he said.

Black compared the situation to a landlord who leases a building to a business.

By increasing service to Manhattan, the airport will become more competitive, offer lower prices and increase the number of flights, Black said.

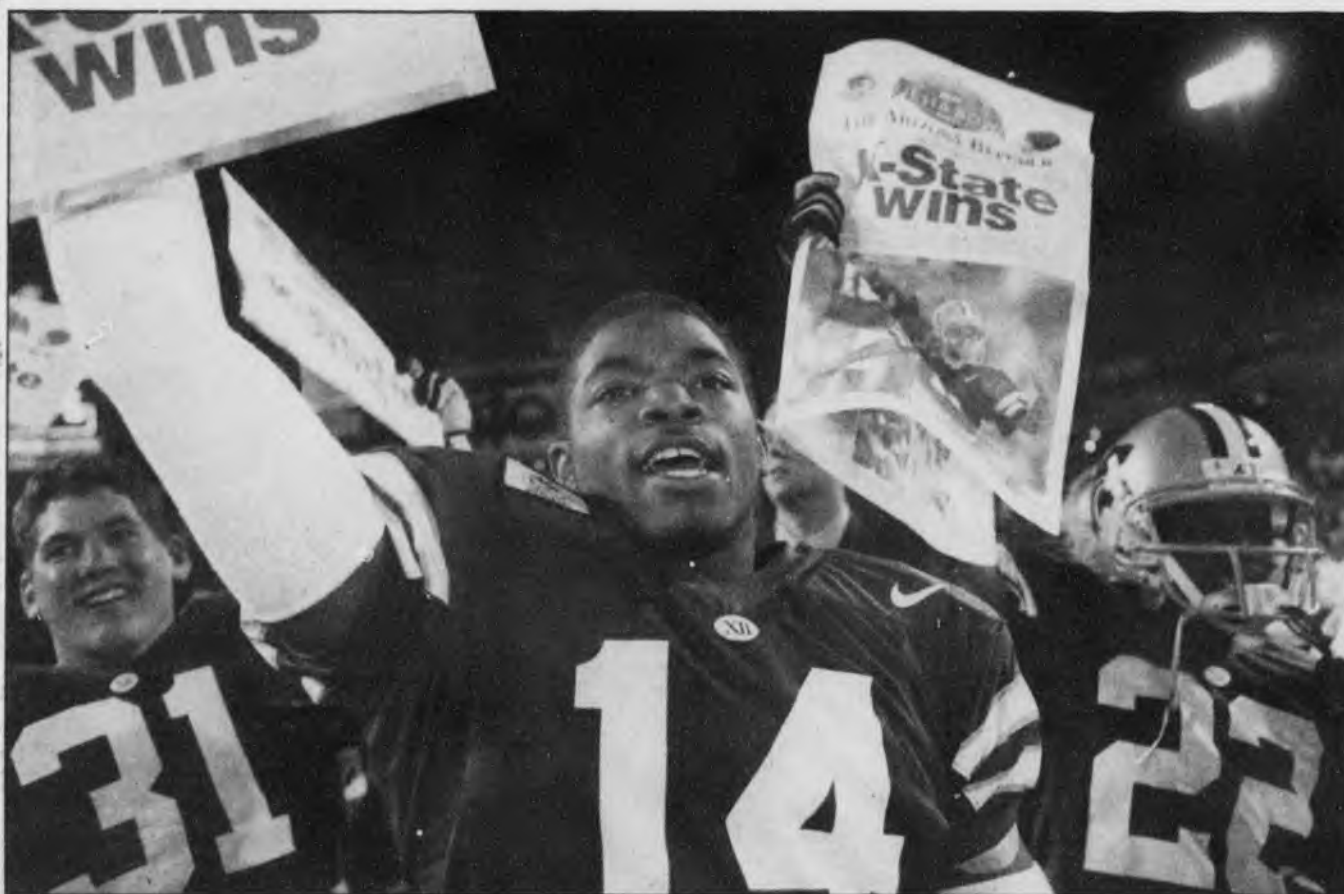

Kris Boone, assistant professor of agricultural economics, frequently uses the airport. She said she is happy with her service, although she would like to see more flight options and lower prices at times.

"They are pretty fair for such a small airport," she said of ticket prices. "If it's compar-

"It's not anything to do with content as I'm concerned, the Collegian can't be a part of it," said.

Jeff Dougan, Student Senate Chair with Johnson's firing.

"Student government is not trying to control content. That is the way try to control content. That is the way try to control content."

"That's why the only person that has editor in chief of the Collegian, not student government."

Dougan said he sent a letter to student comment on the situation to prevent student government being involved.

"Student government is not involved in any sense to me at the time to see what should be commenting on the situation in the situation," he said. "It was to try to control content."

Todd Simon, director of the A.Q. Mass Communications and chairman of the firing was content-driven.

"Content isn't what drove this vote," he said. "While content wasn't played a role on some smaller level."

"In something like this, concerns about the surface, even though I don't think Simon said."

And while content was said not to be Carney said Johnson's performance was not content-driven.

Airport captures small share of local travel market

JAMI BOYLES
Kansas State Collegian

Manhattan Regional Airport is not living up to its potential, according to an air-service analysis done during the past year.

"All we're capturing right now is about 13 to 14 percent of the market," Kenneth Black, airport director, said. "We're missing out on an enormous part of the market share."

Black said he was able to convince the Manhattan City Commission to hire a consulting firm for $28,000 in fall 1996.

The consulting firm tracked flight movements of travelers in the airport's service area, a seven-county area around Manhattan. Using travel agencies, flight records and several other methods, the firm studied the airlines and airports potential customers were using.

According to the results, people in this area accounted for about 152,000 enplanements, or boardings, last year.

Only 23,000 of those boardings were from the Manhattan Regional Airport, Black said.

Airport Advisory Board member Richard Hayter said the airport is facing three main problems. The cost and number of flights offered are two obstacles, he said.

The third involves USAirways Express — the airport's only commercial carrier.

USAirways Express doesn't travel to any prominent air-traffic hubs, Black said, and Manhattan needs an airline that does so.

Black said he was going to talk with USAirways Express about offering flights to more destinations than Kansas City, Mo.,

which is not considered a prominent hub.

"They have indicated some interest in doing that," he said. "It opens up more opportunities for the customer."

USAirways' business at Manhattan's airport isn't bad, Black said.

"Even with just 13 to 14 percent of the market, it's a very good operation for them," he said.

Black compared the situation to a landlord who leases a building to a business.

"You can't force businesses to do everything you want them to," he said.

Black said the airport is trying to get two more airlines in Manhattan that travel to prominent hubs. If they are successful, both the cost and number of flights will improve, he said.

The air-service analysis indicated the airport would have a better chance at soliciting new airlines if USAirways Express were not in Manhattan, Black said. But he said he has no intention of encouraging the airline to leave Manhattan, even if they do not offer the increased service.

"You don't want to lose the service you have. You don't want to throw it away," he said. "That's stupid."

He said airlines generally make their money in less competitive markets. Right now, this area is not a competitive market. Black said he thought Manhattan was lucky the prices were as good as they are.

"In less-competitive markets, the prices are higher," he said.

By increasing service to Manhattan, the airport will become more competitive, offer lower prices and increase the number of flights, Black said.

Kris Boone, assistant professor of agricultural economics, frequently uses the airport. She said she is happy with her service, although she would like to see more flight options and lower prices at times.

"They are pretty fair for such a small airport," she said of ticket prices. "If it's comparative, it's certainly worth it. When it's considerably more expensive, we do not use it."

Many other activities are underway in an attempt to make the airport more self-sufficient, Black said. The airport will be increasing long-term parking spaces and building a new fixed-base operation facility. There will probably be a fee for parking in the future, he said.

The airport might also consider leasing some land by the highway for commercial development, he said.

Black said the revenues for the airport have increased 39 percent, while the expenses have increased only 18 percent.

"We're closing the gap," he said. "It's going to take a while, but we'll get there."

In the end, Black said his goal is to improve the airport's service and reduce the cost to taxpayers.

"My job is to provide safe, efficiently operated facilities," Black said. "The city has an obligation to improve the services here. We have an obligation to the taxpayer to try to make this airport self-sufficient."

Chair, senators say SGA not involved in board's decision

ANDREA COREY
Kansas State Collegian

Ron Johnson's position as director of Student Publications Inc. was vacated last Wednesday in a 6-4 vote by the Board of Student Publications.

The action taken at the meeting has been the cause of speculation about the board's reasoning and also about Student Governing Association's role in the decision made.

However, student senators said SGA had no influence on the board's decision.

"SGA is not involved," said Patrick Carney, student senator and former chairman of the board.

Carney said some members of SGA are upset because of rumors and implications made about SGA's role in Johnson's firing.

"Director Johnson seemed to stress that we were — first of all, that we were leading this attack, which we were not, and secondly that the actions of the board were content-driven, which they are not," Carney said.

Carlton Getz, student senator and member of the board, agreed that Johnson's firing was not based on content.

"It's not anything to do with content. Our bylaws prevent it. As far as I'm concerned, the Collegian can print whatever it wants," he said.

Jeff Dougan, Student Senate Chair, said Senate was not involved with Johnson's firing.

"Student government is not trying to control the content of the Collegian, the Royal Purple or even the phone book. We do not in any way try to control content. That is the Collegian's issue," he said. "That's why the only person that has control over the content is the editor in chief of the Collegian, not student government."

Dougan said he sent a letter to student senators asking them not to comment on the situation to prevent the appearance of student government being involved.

"Student government is not involved in the issue, so it didn't make any sense to me at the time to see why student government people should be commenting on the situation, when we have no involvement in the situation," he said. "It was to try to eliminate any confusion."

Todd Simon, director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications and chairman of the board, said he didn't think the firing was content-driven.

"Content isn't what drove this vote," he said.

He said that while content wasn't directly an issue, it might have played a role on some smaller level.

"In something like this, concerns about content are never far from the surface, even though I don't think they're much relevant here," Simon said.

And while content was said not to be an issue, Simon, Getz and Carney said Johnson's performance was.

Last September, Johnson said he voiced complaints to the Privilege Fee Committee. According to minutes of the meeting, Johnson was called out of order. The meeting resulted in Dougan sending a letter to Johnson and copies to administrators and student senators.

In the letter, Dougan asked that Johnson "not personally attack committee members." He also wrote, "Many individuals expressed how insulted they felt at your implications and improprieties."

Carney said he complained about Johnson's actions after the meeting.

"I have raised serious objections to Director Johnson's actions at

Weekend powwow raises money for shelter, group

JON KURCHE
Kansas State Collegian

Outside Ahearn Field House, drums could be heard echoing off the walls Saturday as K-State played host to a Native American powwow.

Inside Ahearn, seven Native American singers sat around a drum, each bringing their batons up and down rhythmically.

The songs of the Gourd Dance, a dance of healing and strength, were sung to revitalize.

As legend goes, songs were sung by a wolf to heal a young man left dying on the plain. As the wolf sang, it gave the man new life.

Pete Fee, the powwow's master of ceremonies, said he likes the songs of the Gourd Dance.

"I think the Gourd Dance has got some of the most beautiful songs of our culture," he said.

Though he likes the music for the Gourd Dance, Fee said he thinks the core of the powwow is the War Dance.

"That takes on a different feeling. It's really the heart of the powwow, I think — the War Dance — and the songs are different, and it just kind of ends things up," Fee said.

Each of the dancers' outfits represented a different tribe.

"Maybe 60 to 40 different tribes are represented. There's a variety of diversity. There's a variety of different people out here," Travis Blackbird, a 1996 K-State graduate, said.

Blackbird, dressed in ceremonial clothing — a headdress of long, thin feathers, a beaded necklace and bells on his knees.

Blackbird said the dancing invigorates him.

"I become a little bit more lively, I feel like I can get energized from it. I feel a little bit more healthy when I do it," he said.

Leo Holiday, student at the Haskell Indian Nations University, said he learned how to create Native American art from his family while he grew up on a reservation.

"Most of my family does the art, we do silver work and some stuff. It's been in our family for a while," he said.

Learning how to create various forms of art didn't take long to develop after Holiday got a few basics skills down.

"At first it did, but eventually it just came to me, and then I just did my own designs," he said.

The powwow had a twofold purpose. One was to help raise money for the Native American Student Body, and the other was to benefit the Manhattan Emergency Shelter.

Every person was asked to bring a can of food as admission. Barbara Smith volunteered for the shelter, and she said she arranged the benefit on her own outside of the shelter because she knew Native American culture would be able to help.

"I've been into the native culture since the seventies, and they are always a giving people, always helping out, trying to help out each other, trying to help out people that understand their culture," Smith said. "They're trying to promote their culture."

25th annual photo contest changes rules; picture size not restricted for UPC event

Three dollars and one click of a camera could win you $50. These two things, along with a K-State ID, are all you need to enter the 25th Annual Photography Contest.

This contest, sponsored by the Union Program Arts Council, is open to K-State students, faculty and staff. Participants may enter up to three photos with a $3 entry fee per photo. Entries will be accepted from Feb. 8 to Feb. 20.

Each photo must be entered in only one of seven categories: buildings and structures, landscape, a captured feeling, animals, people, still life or campus/student life.

The prize in each category is $30 for first and $20 for second. The photo judged as the best overall wins $50.

Winners will be announced on Feb. 21 from each category and will have their work displayed in the Union Art Gallery between Feb. 22 and March 6.

Students wishing to enter should stop by the UPC office on the third floor of the K-State Student Union between 8 a.m. and 4 p.m. for more information and an application.

CORRECTIONS/CLARIFICATIONS

Because of incorrect information provided by a source, there was an error in a story in Friday's Collegian, "Native American Student Body sponsors benefit Saturday for emergency shelter." The powwow this weekend was sponsored by Native American Student Body and was to benefit the Manhattan Emergency Shelter. However, the shelter did not officially request aid from K-State or NASB.

The Collegian regrets this error.

The Collegian's conflict of interest policy is something we take very seriously. Our writers are not allowed to write about organizations they are part of, cover issues they are vocal about, or interview friends or family. As journalists, we must be completely objective in our coverage of any story, and we will do what is necessary to ensure that.

CHRIS DEAN
Chris can be reached at 532-6556 in the newsroom or send your e-mail to readers@pub.ksu.edu.

Sometimes, though, an issue comes along that affects the entire newsroom, and it becomes difficult to avoid the appearance of bias. Last week, we were faced with such an issue.

On Wednesday, the Board of Student Publications voted to vacate the position of director of Student Publications Inc., removing Ron Johnson from the job he has had for nine years. Because the board is the governing body of the Collegian and Johnson is our adviser, the issue affects every member of the Collegian directly, yet we still have to cover the news.

In cases such as this, we have to assign a writer and trust them to handle the story like any other — reporting fairly and accurately, covering both sides of the story without bias and saving all opinions for the opinion page in the form of an editorial board. Also, just as in any other story, care is taken to make sure all opinions are kept on the opinion page and news on the news pages, and never the twain shall meet.

Because this issue hit so close to home, it has received extra care. Students wishing to speak out in favor of Johnson are allowed to do so as individuals, but are not reporting the story for the Collegian. The Collegian editors are also making their opinions known through the editorial board, printed daily on page four. These opinions, however, are different than the news coverage of the story in the rest of the paper.

Members of the Collegian staff may have strong opinions regarding this matter, but we promise we are doing our best to keep those opinions out of our news stories and give you, the readers, only the unbiased facts, just as we would in any other story.

If you feel that we violate that promise in any way now or in the future, as this kind of situation is bound to come up again, please let me know. We are doing our best, but we don't know how good that is unless we hear from you.

Scanning microscope subject of weekly physics colloquium

JON KURCHIE
Kansas State Collegian

Weekly colloquium sessions have been a 50-year tradition in the K-State Department of Physics.

Nate Folland, professor of physics, said it's something the department tries to do regularly.

"We try to provide each week a forum in which people are trying to speak to the entire department," Folland said. "I've been here since '65 — we've been having a regular weekly colloquium as part of the physics department schedule since before the war."

The war, in this case, was World War II. Folland said the colloquiums have developed over the years to help expose researchers to areas they are unfamiliar with.

"It's evolved over time just as the department's evolved. Earlier there were fewer specialties," he said. "Sometimes it's good to get off thinking about something else."

Thursday afternoon, the physics department continued the colloquium tradition with a lecture about surface interactions from Bruce Law, associate professor of physics.

Law began his presentation by displaying a picture on an overhead projector of a European city with streets winding through the central district and a mountain rising above the buildings. It was Grenoble, a town in France where Law recently spent 2 1/2 months working.

Law began telling about his trip from a tourist's view — noting that the skiing was lousy — and pointed at the screen, showing the audience the hotel he stayed at and the gondola that travels up the mountain.

"The only thing you have to be careful about is not to step on dog poop," Law said. "They seem to be very keen on dogs."

After flipping over to next page, it became clear the lecture was not about travel. The page displayed a large gray ring and various buildings scattered around it. It was an accelerator — an atom smasher. The mountain and town were now in the background, Law pointed at the screen.

"This here is the most powerful X-ray source in the world," Law said.

He pointed to another spot on the page. "This here is the most powerful source of neutrons in the world," he said.

His U.S. lab was in the process of developing a new type of scanning microscope.

The microscope, which is housed in the basement of Cardwell Hall, is the only one of its type in the world. It employs a more sophisticated imaging device than its predecessors, and for that reason, it allows researchers the opportunity to see flat layers only one molecule in thickness.

"People have been fiddling around with this type of surface microscopy for five or six years or so," Law said. "I decided you could do it better with a very sophisticated camera — we can see single layers of molecules very easily."

Law recently received a grant from the National Science Foundation to fund his work on surface interactions continuously for eight years.

Surface interaction which governs what happens when two substances touch.

"Surface interactions are important in many spheres of life — chemistry, catalytic converters, lubrication — that's all due to surfaces and spreading and all that," Law said.

Speaker says affirmative action helps, hurts

► ALUMNUS STRESSES

TO WORK TOGETHER.

JENNIFER PAYTON
Kansas State Collegian

Many issues need to be discussed when dealing with the policy of affirmative action, David Hall, K-State alumnus, said in his lecture, "Affirmative Action: Cure or Ill?" on Friday.

He said people on different sides of the issue have to overcome animosity and heal today's society.

Hall, who is dean of the law school at Northeastern University in Boston, played basketball for K-State from 1969 to 1972. He graduated from K-State in 1972 with a degree in political science.

Hall said affirmative action is a topic everyone seems to have a strong opinion about. He said some people believe affirmative action is a social ill, and others believe it can cure discrimination.

"I believe that both sides are creating a social minefield," Hall said. "Some critics and defendants have lost sight of the ultimate goal."

Hall said affirmative action does not address issues such as the inequality of school systems in the United States. He said the way public education is financed today, children in poorer communities are not meeting academic standards.

"Everyone needs to be measured by the same academic yardstick," Hall said, stressing the importance of equality for children in wealthy and poor communities.

Hall said some schools only teach the best and the brightest, and the lack of attention hinders other young minds.

"Education is the wings of equality and success," Hall said. He added he would have had fewer opportunities if not for affirmative action.

"I would not be a dean of a leading law school in this country if not for this program we are debating," he said.

Hall said affirmative action was not a cure-all, but it is still able to knock down barriers, although he added that stereotypes and stigmas are embedded in society.

"This society must come to grips with how we fail to understand those that are different from us," he said. "Affirmative action cannot undo centuries of discrimination. This requires a revolution of the hearts, souls and minds of everyone in society."

OURview

Our View, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. The editorial board consists of Collegian editors and other staff members. Our View is the Collegian's official opinion.

Communication would increase understanding

Thursday night, Todd Simon and two students addressed Student Senate during open period. Simon, as chair of the Board of Student Publications and director of the A. Q. Miller School of Journalism, urged the improvement of relations between the Collegian through dialogue. He offered background and perspective, and answered questions.

The students addressed their concerns about the vote to remove Ron Johnson as Collegian news editorial adviser and director of Student Publications Inc., but what came out of the meeting was more mixed messages.

Student Senate has nothing to do with the board's vote to declare the position of Student Publications director vacant, in effect terminating Johnson's position.

There is, however, a difference between the involvement of the entity and the actions of individual elected representatives.

For their part, elected SGA members have consistently maintained that they have no control or jurisdiction over the actions of the board. They don't.

However, all K-State students are part of SGA, and the governing body has presented itself as a forum for student concerns. Designated times, such as open period, allow for this forum. Discussions about this issue need to be taken seriously.

Students should always feel that Senate is a resource and forum for their questions and point of view. Senate acts as a voice of the community on issues such as the Anderson Avenue expansion and should be equally concerned about student concerns.

When board members won't explain their decision, students don't have many places to go.

The Collegian staff, specifically Editor in Chief Kelly Furnas, is willing to discuss this issue with students. He can be reached in the newsroom at 532-6556 or by e-mail at krf5663@ksu.edu.

Letters to the editor are also welcome on all sides of the issue.

There have been misconceptions and misunderstandings between members of the Collegian staff and Student Senate about how involved the group on either side of the street has been.

This is yet another example of a breakdown in communication on both sides. The press has to cover government, and government needs the press to get its messages out. Underneath the titles, we are all students pursuing an education.

Both entities are committed, in principle, to serving the student body. We can't accomplish anything if we aren't talking to each other.

A simple murder?

Issue about salvation, not justice

Did she deserve to die? Yes.

Karla Faye Tucker, in my opinion, deserved the death penalty. I believe that when one human murders another, as in Tucker's case, the responsibility of the government is to deliver justice.

Last week I read in newspapers, heard on radio and viewed on television debates concerning Tucker's predicament. On one particular TV show, callers were allowed to voice their opinions. Several Christians called the host and said Tucker was converted. They said she had been born-again and her nature had changed. She had found salvation.

As a believer in Christ, I genuinely hope Tucker did find salvation through Jesus. But the issue fails to be addressed. The question is not, as some were claiming, about her having a change of life. The issue is about her committing murder.

Tucker destroyed two lives in 1983. Don't skirt the matter by bringing her peace with God into interference with her form of punishment.

Again I must emphasize, especially because of my convictions, that I remain exceedingly glad Tucker found God through Christ. He is the best thing that could have happened for her. However, I will state my opposition to the Christians who cried for her appeal. I believe God's word is in favor of capital punishment. And I think it is clear.

One woman asked the TV commentator, "Do two wrongs make a right?"

No, they do not. But may I remind her, and all who have ever asked this question, of one thing — God is just. While he is a loving, merciful and compassionate God, he is a just God. A perfect and holy God demands justice. This attribute, often omitted from the church pulpit, is still true of God today the same as it always has been. I am convinced that the omission of the justice God requires has left us seeing only the love of God. Don't forget forgiveness is found through the embodiment of justice and love — Jesus Christ. When Jesus hung on the cross, it was out of love, but it was because of justice.

As individuals, we are not supposed to have vengeance upon another. That is God's responsibility. The same way God can bring a sinner to repentance through people, so his vengeance can be carried out through the God-ordained institution known as government. It is not our role individually to carry out justice, but it is government's duty — its obligation.

I have heard it argued that because of the death penalty, many innocent victims are put to death. I am sorry injustices like these occur. I wish they would never happen. Even so, I believe we would severely damage our society if we eradicated the death penalty.

Before anyone becomes irate and fills my mailbox with countless e-mails telling me why my opinion is wrong, let me clarify a potential misunderstanding. I am talking only about cold-blooded murder. It becomes a different situation with a different punishment when accidental or inadvertent murder is committed. But for the cases where murder is premeditated, justice demands to be carried out.

After having lived in Saudi Arabia for 10 years, my friend Robby explained why that country's crime rate is so low. Justice there involves cutting off the right hand for theft, and the chopping gets more severe as the crime increases. Why wouldn't crime be low?

When it becomes common practice to sentence murderers to death, one considering this offense might be persuaded otherwise.

When justice strikes, violent crimes will be deterred by imposing the ultimate penalty — death. I think we, especially in the United States, have an extremely humane way of enforcing capital punishment.

Not that death of any kind would necessarily be enjoyable, but the pain endured is minimal in comparison to the victim's agony. Lethal injection is far less painful than a pickaxe.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Do what is right, not what is popular

It has not been a banner week for K-State public servants. Intentions and characters have been called into question. I have been stopped in the middle of campus, received phone calls and e-mails and literally been screamed at about the actions of elected officials. My response to people who have issues is to please contact the people responsible directly because I do not serve as a go-between. I serve as a student senator from the College of Arts and Sciences.

I have served in the Student Governing Association for two years and have found it to be one of the best experiences of my life. I got involved to learn and, I hope, make some positive changes to K-State. Plus, I have met people who will be friends of mine long after we leave K-State. They have supported me, and I am proud to call them my friends — people I trust and respect. These are good people with the best intentions at heart.

However, with the challenging times come the good times, and one of the best times of the year is approaching: elections. Because I do not have to run my own campaign this year, I am considering putting up signs stating: WANTED: PEOPLE TO SERVE. Now, this is not a money-making venture. In fact, student government takes lots of time, but running and winning a campaign outweighs the loss of sleep. If you are a K-State student who shows interest, or has questions, then walk into the Office of Student Activities and Services and get signed up.

Most students choose not to get involved because they are unsure of issues that need to be addressed. If you have concerns about funding for Hale Library, the parking situation, or even the location of trees on this campus, make them pertinent issues.

Here is Lisa's advice to run a quality campaign.

1. File by the deadline. If filing forms are not turned in by the deadline, it kind of defeats the purpose of being placed on the ballot.
2. Attend one of the mandatory meetings wearing your Sunday best and carrying a lucky charm. At this meeting, your photo will be taken for the Voters' Guide and numbers will be drawn for placement on the ballot. So Zach Zeus still has a chance to be listed first on the ballot.

VIEWPOINT
Lisa is a senior in political science. You can send e-mail to Lisa at batman@ksu.edu.

(A Lisa hint: Stay healthy before this meeting. Last year, I was sick for two days before the meeting so my picture resembled a cousin of the Grim Reaper.)

3. Read and understand the elections regulations code. One of my favorite people put many hours into rewriting it, so it deserves to be read for that reason alone. But also, the regulations must be followed. You do not want to put in the time to run a campaign and win an election only to find the dreaded asterisk beside your name for an elections violation. The chances of being sworn into office diminish greatly.
4. Make some signs and chalk some sidewalks. I had lots of fun hanging signs and chalking sidewalks. I also believe I am one of the few people who really likes the look of campus during elections. True, campus starts to look a bit cluttered, but it is not as if the signs and chalk will be there forever.
- (Two Lisa hints: Little sisters are the greatest sign hangers, and take caution when reading the sidewalks. I tripped and fell down while reading the sidewalks during my freshman year. I even had green chalk and scrapes all over my face.)
5. Talk to people. Let them know who is running and why they should vote. (Lisa hint: Talk to people from your college. It is a nice gesture but unfortunately, engineering students cannot vote for Senate seats in agriculture.)
6. VOTE. VOTE. VOTE. The dates of the general election are March 9-11, and if needed, the runoff election is March 18 and 19. This piece of advice goes to everyone. VOTE. VOTE. VOTE.
7. Stay calm while waiting for the results. Hang out with friends. Take a nap. Go work out at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. Finish homework. The results will be posted eventually.
8. Take down signs by the deadline. (Lisa hint: Refer to advice No. 3.)
9. Congratulate the winners and console the ones who did not make it.
10. Accept the responsibility of being a new K-State public servant. Trust me, it is an unusual experience. From my experience, I have learned who my real friends are, know that my sister is an awesome listener and have a better understanding of who I am.

Overall Lisa hint: Do what is right, not what is popular.

Stop pointing fingers until all facts are in

Editor,

First, I'd like to state up front that I have no clue exactly what's going on in the Board of Student Publications, and this lack of knowledge puts me in good company. The majority of those who have written in response to this fascinating intrigue have very little clue themselves. But nobody seems shy about sharing opinions, so I figured I'd jump in.

To repeat myself: very, very few people actually know what prompted Director of Student Publications Inc. Ron Johnson's removal. It's obviously much too easy to accept the official explanation given by the board. The collective conscience has already decided this is a ruse to hide the true feelings of manipulative, slimy, personally affronted by we-don't-know-what-exactly students.

I wonder if any of these evil creatures smoke — could be the work of Cancer Man, putting mind altering drugs in people's cigarettes so he could convince them to fire their director and take over K-State's free press. But I doubt it.

The point is this: We don't know why the board decided to fire Johnson. The members aren't talking and, I'll be shot for saying this, there might be some damn good reasons. Nobody I've been aware of and that the Collegian has put in print has even considered giving the board the benefit of the doubt. I'm not saying it acted correctly. I'm saying I don't know all the facts. I refuse to bash people until I do.

So let's just knock off all these friendly comments about whiners, spineless wimps, and "railroaders" until the facts become available for public consumption. If, when they do, it becomes clear that the board has acted with gross negligence — go ahead, eat them alive or throw them to the nearest band of wild wolves, whatever makes you feel good. Until then, back off.

Journalism alumnus appalled with action

Editor,

In a time in our country when reports indicate that education is below that of other nations, many programs have been implemented that strive to raise awareness of this situation and attempt to raise the poor standard that we seem to be showing. Why then does the bureaucracy of educational institutions such as K-State feel it necessary to take actions that would hinder the progression of positive education?

I am referring, of course, to the action that has been taken against Ron Johnson, director of Student Publications Inc.

As a recent graduate of K-State's A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications, I was appalled to read in The Wichita Eagle that Johnson had been voted out of his position as director of this entity in order to exercise stricter censorship of an already conservative newspaper.

During my time at K-State, Johnson showed only the highest standards of teaching in educating students on the workings of the media, and furthermore, the ethics that had to be maintained in a journalist's career.

Now it seems, as a result of his hard work and standard of excellence, he is being rewarded with a removal from his position at Student Publications.

If we are guaranteed, by the Constitution, our right to free speech, why is it the administrative powers feel the need to exercise their power in censoring the voice of the students on a generally conservative campus? It is shameful that the board has taken this action against Johnson, Student Publications, and the entire student body.

If anything, Johnson should be commended and praised for his hours of toil in overseeing K-State's award-winning publications and for his dedication to the education of students.

Steven Ware
K-State alumnus, A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications

Recent board decision part of larger story

Editor,

Ron Johnson's removal as the director of Student Publications Inc. is disturbing. Johnson is one of the most dynamic professors at K-State, to say nothing of a phenomenal adviser. He taught a lot of things to Collegian alumni: accuracy, honesty, dependability, truth — especially truth. He is a role model for other advisers and media professionals alike. His commitment to his students continues long after their graduation or their tenure at the Collegian.

The board will never successfully answer to anyone about its decision to remove Johnson. It can't. This story is really more than two years old, a story of persistent and tiresome harassment of Johnson and the Collegian. The board continues to pull frayed strings in hopes of removing a dynamic champion of First Amendment rights, and it will not succeed because there is no display of accountability or integrity in its actions.

The press, concerned K-State alumni and the student body await a reasonable answer from those who wished to see Johnson's removal. Perhaps you could formulate one at your next closed meeting.

Laboratory helps faculty scientists gather, process research information

SHERYL WILLIAMS
Kansas State Collegian

K-State researchers have access to the latest electronic technology to assist them in capturing and processing data.

The Electronics Design Laboratory offers a high-tech solution to certain problems with data acquisition — the process of sensing a physical parameter, such as temperature, pressure or electrical activity in the body, and getting the data into a form where the researcher can analyze it.

Typically, converting the data means getting it into the computer.

"Research, in general, has become very dependent on electronics," Tim Sobering, director of the EDL, said. "A measurement is really key to research. Measurement usually means electronics, and electronics leads you back to electrical engineering or electrical engineers."

The EDL, in Burt Hall, was created to provide faculty researchers with state-of-the-art electronic technology.

"The philosophy behind this organization is that a scientist, in general, shouldn't have to be an expert in electronics and computer data acquisition in order to do whatever it is he does," Sobering said.

Seven departments and organizations on campus, a National Science Foundation grant and university remodeling funds, totaling $1 million, were used to create the EDL.

Before coming to K-State, Sobering worked for Sandia National Laboratories in Albuquerque, N.M. His last eight years with Sandia were spent developing various instrumentation for satellite systems.

"Tim has a world of experience in working in a national lab," Vice Provost for Research Tim Donoghue said.

Sobering said there is much excitement in the EDL and among the researchers.

The EDL has three full-time employees and eight students who work to solve the researchers' problems.

"If you have a strong research program, that trickles down and gives you a stronger educational program, because you have the equipment, the facilities and the resources that the students get exposed to," Sobering said, "and that benefits them in their education."

Noel Stanton, professor of physics, said he is impressed with the lab and with Sobering.

"Virtually all major research universities have a facility of this kind. Having one at K-State is really in place as a research institution. The electronics lab that Tim Sobering has set up, as far as these electronics labs go, is an excellent electronics lab," Stanton said. "Sobering is really a first-class engineer."

WOMEN'S HOCKEY CAPS 1ST DAY

NAGANO, Japan — A day of firsts — first medal, first world record, first snowstorm — was capped when the American women's ice hockey team made its successful Olympic debut and a Russian couple finished first in the pairs figure skating short program.

The U.S. women skaters beat China 5-0 to win their first Olympic contest, outshooting their over-matched opponents 31-10. Veteran forward Cammi Granato, the team captain, opened the scoring with a power play goal and knocked in a rebound for the last U.S. goal.

The first session of the pairs figure skating ended with two-time Olympic medalist Artur Dmitriev of Russia and his new partner, Oksana Kazakova, in the lead. A pair of American teams stood fourth and sixth.

The Americans won none of the nine medals awarded Sunday, when Russian cross-country skier Olga Danilova captured the game's first gold medal. Dutch speedskater Gianni Romme set a world record in the 5,000-meter speedskating, and Canadian snowboarder Ross Rebagliati won the first snowboard competition.

The men's downhill, with the debut of Austrian skiing sensation Herman Maier, was postponed three days to Wednesday by a wicked snowstorm that could dump up to 17 inches of snow on the Japanese Alps. Snow was still falling early today, with the men's combined slalom delayed.

HACKL CLAIMS TOP SPOT IN LUGE

When the action resumes Monday, two-time defending Olympic gold medalist Georg Hackl remains the man to beat. Hackl, who survived a snow delay and a U.S. protest over his boots, set a track record in claiming the top spot after the first two of four runs.

The best U.S. hope for a medal, Wendel Suckow of Marquette, Mich., was in sixth place after day one.

APPLAUSE FOR THE DUTCHMAN

Gianni Romme had the world record in 5,000-meter speedskating coming into the Olympics, and he still has it — but a staggering 8 1/2 seconds lower. Romme, his clapskates flashing over the fast M-Wave ice, won the Olympic gold medal in 6 minutes, 22.20 seconds, six seconds ahead of silver-medal Dutch teammate Rintje Ritsma.

SNOW DELAYS MEN'S DOWNHILL

With the men's downhill postponed three days because of snow, more snow was forecast, accompanied by high winds up to 25 mph in the mountains. In Nagano city, the forecast was for light snow and temperatures around freezing.

SNOWBOARD GOLD GOES TO CANADA

Ross Rebagliati of Canada won the first Olympic men's giant slalom snowboard gold medal with a time of 2 minutes, 3.96 seconds. Thomas Prugger of Italy won the silver in 2:03.98 and Ueli Kestenholz of Switzerland the bronze in 2:04.08. Chris Klug of Aspen, Colo., second after the first run, and Jasey-Jay Anderson of Canada, the first-round leader, both fell in the second runs and finished well back.

AMERICANS PASS SKI ELIMINATIONS

Americans kept solid medal prospects after elimination rounds of men's and women's moguls. Donna Weinbrecht of West Milford, N.J., was tied for first and Liz McIntyre of Winter Park, Colo., tied for third in the women's event, and Jonny Moseley of Tiburon, Calif., was first in the men's. Finals are Wednesday.

DANILOVA WINS 1ST GOLD OF GAMES

Olga Danilova, known primarily for missed chances in the Olympics, won the women's 15-kilometer classical cross-country ski race, the first gold medal of the Nagano Winter Games. The top American finisher was Kerrin Petty, more than five minutes behind the winner.

CANADA DEFEATS JAPAN IN HOCKEY

Canada started the first Olympic women's ice hockey tournament with a display befitting a world champion — and that's what the Canadians are. They outshot Japan 64-3 in a 12-0 victory. Finland defeated Sweden 6-0 in the tournament's historic first game. In the men's tournament, Austria squandered a two-goal lead, then scored 1:09 from the end to tie Kazakhstan 5-5.

EXISTING STRUCTURES IMPORTANT

The city's mayor says future Olympic hosts should rely more heavily on facilities that already have been built, even if that means having some events in neighboring countries. Mayor Tasuku Tsukada said the use of existing facilities will become increasingly important because of the swelling expense of hosting the games.

QUOTEBOOK

"The Olympic committee makes millions of dollars out of television rights. Why shouldn't those who make the show get money? Money is life, it's everything." Sking great Karl Schranz, still bitter over his disqualification at the 1972 Winter Games for professional contracts.

"At least I can say I had a world record for a little while. It was a great performance. Six seconds faster was unbelievable." Bart Veldkamp, who lowered the world 5,000-meter speedskating record for about 15 minutes at the Olympics then watched it beaten twice.

"This one's for Lumpy." Ross Rebagliati, dedicating his snowboard giant slalom gold medal to fellow Canadian snowboarder Geoff "Lumpy" Leidal, who was killed in an avalanche last month.

K-STATE'S DUANE DAVIS BREAKS AWAY FROM THE GRASP OF NEBRASKA'S TYRONN LUE (LEFT) AND LARRY FLORENCE (RIGHT) DURING THE FINAL MINUTE OF K-STATE'S WIN IN LINCOLN ON SATURDAY. SATURDAY'S VICTORY WAS THE FIRST K-STATE MEN'S BASKETBALL ROAD WIN SINCE THE BIG 12 STARTED LAST YEAR.

THROUGH 13 TRIES OVER THE COURSE OF 2 YEARS, K-STATE HAD NEVER WON A BIG 12 ROAD GAME. BUT WITH A 69-63 WIN ON SATURDAY AT NEBRASKA,

THEY DID IT

► DIES' LAST-MINUTE LAYUP BRINGS CATS 1ST-EVER CONFERENCE ROAD WIN

JEREMY KELLEY

Kansas State Collegian

LINCOLN, Neb. — The monkey was finally lifted off K-State's back.

That is, the monkey of 14 consecutive conference road losses, dating back to the 1995-96 season. K-State recorded its first-ever Big 12 road win, 69-63, against Nebraska.

With K-State in front 65-63 and just less than a minute to play in the contest, junior forward Manny Dies hit a layup that sealed the win for K-State.

"It wasn't a designed play or anything. It just happened," Dies said of his last-minute heroics. "I knew I could make that shot, and it just so happened that I did."

Dies capped off K-State's first-ever conference road win with an emphatic dunk with two seconds left.

"That felt good," Dies said. "It was the caper for the game — for finally getting a road win."

But it wasn't so much the heroics of Dies that earned K-State the victory, but rather guards Aaron Swartzendruber and Josh Reid and forward Shawn Rhodes. Swartzendruber finished with 11 points, Reid had a team-high 12, and Rhodes finished with nine points and 10 rebounds.

With time winding down on the shot-clock, Swartzendruber called for a clear-out and hit a long three-pointer that put K-State up for good with 1:55 left in the game.

"That was huge," Reid said of the shot. "We've hit some big shots down the stretch, and usually it's the shooters who step up and make those plays, and Aaron stepped up."

Nebraska forward Andy Markowski missed a jumper with 1:33 left that would have tied the score, and Nebraska lost its fourth straight.

"Any play in a close game is obviously instrumental," K-State Coach Tom Asbury said. "This is the first time we really have been in one right at the very end. We've been in some close conference games. I don't think those games were winnable for us until tonight, and that was good because we did what we needed to do."

K-State's defense shut down Nebraska's post play. The Huskers were forced to hit from the outside, but they responded to the challenge.

Husker guard Troy Piatkowski kept Nebraska close throughout the entire game with five-of-nine shooting from beyond the arc, finishing with 17 points. Junior guard Tyronn Lue scored 16 points, but was just six-of-16 from the field.

Asbury said K-State's depth wore down the Huskers by the end of the game.

"Realistically, they play six guys, and we play 10, and we play 12 a lot," Asbury said. "I think they were probably a little tired, and I think our depth should wear them down and should wear several teams down."

K-State improved to 14-6, 5-5 in the conference, a mark that puts the Cats in a three-way tie for fifth in the Big 12 standings.

► K-STATE'S NARROW WIN OVER NEBRASKA PUTS CATS IN 5TH PLACE IN CONFERENCE.

JOEL WHITE

Kansas State Collegian

LINCOLN, Neb. — K-State's men's basketball team went to Nebraska to finish what it started nearly two years ago — a 14-game conference road losing streak.

The Wildcats' streak, which started in Lincoln on March 3, 1996, was ended there Saturday with a 69-63 K-State win.

"We all know how close this league is," K-State coach Tom Asbury said. "Any road win is huge in this league."

The Cats' first-ever Big 12 road win put them in fifth place in the conference. They now have a 5-5 record in the conference, with six games remaining. Asbury said the win over the Huskers was important for the Cats' post-season tournament hopes.

"It keeps you in the hunt and in the picture knowing that you need to get a — or some — road wins," Asbury said. "Then you try to hold the fort the best you can at home and scratch and claw and see where the standings fall."

The Cats are 4-0 against Big 12 teams at home, but separation from the middle of the Big 12 will not likely occur without any road wins.

"That's the thing that everybody talks about this year — you're so tough at home, but when you go out on the road you just fold," Cats forward Josh Reid said. "Today we had to come out and prove that we can play on the road."

Reid led the Cats in scoring against the Huskers with 12 points. He also pulled down seven rebounds.

Cat guard Aaron Swartzendruber said the win was instrumental in separating from the middle of the pack in the Big 12.

"As everybody knows, there are about six teams in the middle of the Big 12 and somebody's got to separate themselves," Swartzendruber said. "And we want to try to do that."

Swartzendruber, who scored 11 points, dished out six assists and grabbed five rebounds, played an integral role in the win over the Huskers. His three-point shot from the top of the key with 1:55 remaining gave the Cats a 65-63 lead they would not relinquish.

Saturday's game was the end of more than one streak. It was also the first time the Cats have defeated the Huskers in Lincoln since Jan. 23, 1993.

"It seems like it should be easier than it is, but that's the thing about Big 12 basketball — it's so tough to go into some of these places and win," Swartzendruber said.

Despite promising 1st half, Cats fall to Jayhawks

DAN MERKER

Kansas State Collegian

LAWRENCE — It would have been the most unlikely of outcomes. The K-State women's basketball team had lost three consecutive games and not won a conference road game all season long.

Kansas had won six of eight, losing only to a pair of top-10 teams during that streak. The Jayhawks hadn't lost at Allen Fieldhouse all season and had won 22 of 23 at home over the past few seasons. Even though K-State beat KU in their first meeting this season — a 53-47 decision Jan. 7 in Bramlage Coliseum — the Hawks have turned their season around, and K-State has lost five of seven since then.

Wildcats kept Saturday's game close, but lost 65-62, dropping their record to 9-11 on the season and 3-7 in Big 12 play.

Despite the loss, K-State coach Deb Patterson said this game was well-played by the Cats.

"This was the best game we've played outside of Bramlage over the course of 40 minutes," Patterson said.

In front of 8,200 fans Saturday afternoon, it appeared for a while the Wildcats would do the unlikely. KU guard Suzi Raymant opened the scoring with a three-pointer off the opening tip, but that was the only lead KU had in the first half.

K-State used a trapping defense and opportunistic offense to lead for most of the first half. The Cats forced 16 KU turnovers in the first half while committing only five and scored the last five points of the half to take a 35-25 lead at the break.

The Hawks came out a different team in the second half, though. On several occasions early in the second half, KU closed

THIS WAS THE BEST GAME WE'VE PLAYED OUTSIDE OF BRAMLAGE ...

DEB PATTERSON
K-State coach

to within three points, but K-State kept responding to expand their lead. With 12:16 left in the second half, a three-pointer by K-State guard Brit Jacobson gave the Cats a 48-42 lead, but the Jayhawks scored the next seven points to take their first lead since the opening minutes at 49-48.

The teams traded the lead several times and were tied at 60 after K-State center Angie Finkes rattled home a layup with 4:37 left. Each team had several opportunities to score late, but defensive pressure by both teams made scoring tough. With less than a minute left, KU had scored the only three points to lead 63-60.

With 24 seconds remaining, Cat forward Nicky Ramage made a shot from the paint to cut the KU lead to one. On the in-bound, Jacobson fouled Raymant, the Hawks' best free-throw shooter at 78.6 percent. Raymant made both free throws to let the Hawks retake a three-point lead.

K-State tried a pair of three-pointers to tie the game, but both were blocked, and the Cats fell again. The four-game losing streak is the longest in Patterson's career at K-State.

"I really thought it was a great basketball game," Patterson said. "It could have gone either way. I thought we had a great opportunity to drop down a shot to tie at the end."

Columnist shares views on Mike Tyson, Jerry Krause's stupidity

What do the Chicago Bulls, Latrell Sprewell, Raef LaFrentz and Bill Snyder have in common? They're all in this column.

• The NBA All Star weekend is over, and Latrell Sprewell is still banned from running the hardwood in the league.

Allow me to drop some knowledge on Sprewell — you just can't choke, hit, castrate or attempt to kill your boss. It's just not good for business, man.

Obviously, what Sprewell did was unacceptable and the essence of stupidity. What NBA Commissioner David Stern did in the aftermath of the debacle was wrong.

Stern suspended Sprewell for a year, the longest non-drug suspension in league history.

You simply cannot deprive a person of his livelihood. Yes, the Warriors had the right to fire him. But other NBA teams, if they are in need of an off guard with mad hops and a tendency to attack coaches, should have the right to sign him if they are so inclined.

• After the Duke-North Carolina game Thursday, three things are obvious.

One, the ACC is the best basketball conference in the nation. Look for two of the Final Four teams to hail from the ACC. Two, Antawn Jamison is the nation's best player.

Forget Raef LaFrentz.

LaFrentz might have soft hands and a sweet jumper, but if he ever met Jamison in a game of one-on-one, he would get used like toilet paper. Jamison is quicker, stronger and faster. He took over the Duke game in the first half. On the other hand, when KU played Arizona in possibly KU's biggest game of the year, LaFrentz got his points but he never dominated like Jamison did Thursday.

Three, North Carolina is hands-down the best team in the country. If that needs to be elaborated on, you didn't watch the game.

• Michael Jordan says he is leaving the NBA if Phil Jackson leaves the Bulls. Bulls general manager Jerry Krause said Jordan is welcome back, but he won't be playing for Jackson. There is only one thing to say.

Jerry, are you stupid, blind or both? Basketball's best player ever to draw air says he'll play if Jackson comes back. Swallow your pride, and hire the coach who has helped bring your organization all those championships.

If Krause allows one of our national treasures to leave, I hope he'll never be able to walk a city street again. Every man, woman and child should throw stones at Krause if Jordan retires as a direct result of Jackson not being offered a contract.

• The world's best boxer, Mike Tyson, dumped his promoter, Don King, last week. Tyson says he is moving forward with his life. Isn't it great to see an ex-con fire an ex-con?

Hey, Tyson, even if you bite 10 million people during your ban from boxing, I'll still drop a few bucks to see you fight a quality opponent. You know who I'm talking about. Just don't bite him — I want my money's worth this time.

• Bill Snyder said he is pleased with his recruiting class this year, but he's not happy with the way he recruited. Translation: Snyder thought he should have worked harder.

This year, Snyder snagged 12 high school players and four community-college players. Snyder said none of the skill players run slower than 4.4 seconds in the 40-yard dash.

Perhaps the most intriguing is running back Frank Murphy from Garden City Community College, because he's already on campus. Murphy is 6 feet 1 inch tall, 205 pounds and runs a 4.26-second 40-yard dash. That is a big, fast package coming through a hole. If he plays up to his size, he'll donate some free snot bubbles to some unfortunate middle linebackers this fall.

TATTOO YOU, TATTOO ME

CAROL REYNOLDS (RIGHT), OF WAMEGO, GRIMACES WHILE RECEIVING HER FIRST TATTOO FROM JON HANDLON AT FINE LINE TATTOO AND BODY PIERCING IN AGGIEVILLE ON FRIDAY. HANDLON AND HIS WIFE, ROGENE HANDLON, OWN A TOTAL OF FIVE FINE LINE STORES IN MANHATTAN, JUNCTION CITY, TOPEKA, LAWRENCE AND OMAHA, NEB. STEVE HERBERT/Collegian

Word of mouth brings customers to Aggieville tattoo shop

AMY MILLER
Kansas State Collegian
Suzie Seba, sophomore in advertising, looked at her friends, who were watching a needle pierce through her bellybutton. "I'm crazy," she said.
She looked up as three more people walked through the front door at Fine Line Tattoo.
"OK, there's like a million people here," she said.
Once Seba was in the chair, Jon Handlon took less than a minute to pierce her with the needle, and then replace it with a metal ring.
Handlon, who owns Fine Line, said the store usually does many more tattoos than piercings. After he finished with Seba, Handlon pierced two more bellybuttons and a nipple within a half hour. He said that is a typical week's worth of piercing for him.

Handlon, who opened his fifth Fine Line store Jan. 1 in Aggieville, said it was important that the shop be located near campus since students make up a large part of his clientele.
"They won't drive," he said.
Handlon, whose other tattoo shops are in Topeka, Lawrence, Junction City and Omaha, Neb., said Fine Line holds the distinction of owning Kansas' first state license for a tattoo shop.

Before January 1997, no state tattoo license was required in Kansas. That changed when the state began to require the shops to get licensed, including subjection to state inspections, he said.
He saw a marked decrease of tattooists in Kansas after the regulation passed.
"They left the state like rafts leaving a sinking ship," he said, as he filled in a Harley-Davidson tattoo on the left arm of St. George resident Cliff Mahan.
Handlon said people occasionally pass out, but they don't usually chicken out.
Mahan, who has a tattoo on his back already, said, "It's a code of honor."

Brad Egan, who runs the front counter at Rad-A-Tat, also in Aggieville, said he has noticed little effect on Rad-A-Tat's business since Fine Line opened.
"We've been too busy to even think about them," he said.
Fine Line will get some business, he said, but Rad-A-Tat is established, with repeat customers returning from surrounding states.
Handlon said that word of mouth from satisfied Fine Line customers is his best advertising, and the shop has a basic method for dealing with area competition.
"Quite simple: We do it better," he said.

the privilege fee meeting this last fall and made those concerns very clear to him as well as other individuals on this campus," Carney said.

He said Johnson's behavior at the September meeting was the same that he had seen in other meetings.

"But I believe that what we're seeing with what happened in that Privilege Fee Committee at the very beginning of the fall semester was once again a return to the type of nastiness — the type of nasty behavior that I wouldn't want to see a student perform," Carney said.

He added that Johnson's performance at that meeting and in other meetings was likely a factor in the board's decision.

"I would have a hard time finding anybody who would agree that a faculty member could behave more crassly or more rudely than a student. In this case, we have one who has, on several occasions, and that needs to be dealt with," Carney said.

Getz and Simon also said they thought Johnson's behavior played a role in the board's decision.

Simon said the board never issued a formal statement, and Johnson's behavior wasn't brought up during the evaluation process he went through as a member of the journalism school faculty.

"In a sense the board may have dealt with it. They've never issued a formal statement," Simon said. "If it's the kind of thing that needs to be dealt with, then it should come up during the evaluation process."

When asked if he was sorry for his actions at the meeting, Johnson said he has thought about that meeting and the causes of his response.

"I have thought about that a lot. In nine years of being at K-State, I've never had student leadership cut a fee in half and blame it on a clerical error and have the same people involved in content complaints at Student Publications," he said.

"I was disappointed in the process and the lack of willingness to approach a situation with common sense."

5th Habitat for Humanity home to bear Oprah's name

JAMI BOYLES

Kansas State Collegian

Oprah Winfrey has named Manhattan Habitat for Humanity's latest housing project an Oprah Home. The house will go to a Manhattan family in need of affordable housing.

Though Harpo Productions, Winfrey's production company, will offer no money to the program, the name recognition is significant, club spokesman Mark Meseke said.

"Any time you loan Oprah's name to a project like that, it will really spur things on," he said.

"Every once in a while you need an extra push."

Winfrey established the program with Habitat for Humanity as part of her Angel Network — an effort to increase involvement in community-service activities around the country. The Angel Network is involved in many other community-service projects.

Manhattan Habitat for Humanity president Marcia Schuley said Winfrey's program helps people to keep a positive focus.

"We hear so much of the negatives," she said. "It touches a spark in people."

Winfrey asked viewers around the country to send postcards to her show offering volunteer service to local Habitat for Humanity affiliates. Out of 15,000 respondents, 15 were from viewers in the area, including Manhattan, Junction City and Fort Riley, Meseke said.

Schuley said the Pi Beta Phi sorority was instrumental in her decision to apply to the program. She said the members heard about the Angel Network promotion on Winfrey's show and encouraged her to apply.

"I give credit to the Pi Phis," she said. "Their enthusiasm was really a catalyst."

Manhattan Habitat for Humanity would like to have a corporate sponsor for this home, Meseke said, but Schuley said none has been named yet.

This is the fifth Habitat for Humanity home in Manhattan. The home will be at 504 S. Manhattan Ave.

Eleven families have applied to live in the home. Families are selected according to their need for the home, willingness to become partners in the construction and ability to pay back the no-interest loan.

The loan payments are used to build other Manhattan Habitat for Humanity homes, Schuley said.

She said the Family Selection Committee is expected to make an announcement later this month.

Habitat for Humanity has built more than 60,000 homes in an effort to end poverty housing.

Schuley said Winfrey will show clips of the Manhattan house on her show this summer.

Bylaws handcuff publication board's control of contracts

JOHN HENDERSON

Kansas State Collegian

When Todd Simon was considering his new job as chairman of the Board of Student Publications Inc., he had some reservations about the company's bylaws.

Initially, he said, they seemed a little thin.

The bylaws might be part of the reason why the board voted 6-4 Wednesday to vacate the director's position filled by Ron Johnson.

Simon said the bylaws are also part of the reason why he, as chairman of the board and director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications, has yet to follow through with Johnson's removal.

"There's no written position description," Simon said. "There's no description of how — if there's a vacancy — how to fill it. There's no description of evaluation and no provisions regarding dismissal."

Simon said company bylaws are meant to be the company's constitution, intentionally broad to cover the basics, and to allow for policies to cover specifics.

But some of the basics, which had become familiar to him after

Next meeting

The Board of Student Publications Inc. will meet at 3 p.m. Sunday in Union 202 to clarify the action taken on Wednesday, vacating Director Ron Johnson's position. According to the agenda, new business will also be discussed at the meeting, including a proposal to permanently establish a reserve account and the Student Publications' privilege fee proposal. Other items might be discussed, including determining a regular meeting schedule for the board.

27 years of experience with collegiate journalism, weren't present at K-State.

For example, he said the bylaws don't say who is eligible to be elected to one of the five at-large positions on the board. It has been understood that those positions are to be filled by students, he said, but that understanding might not stand up over time.

"If there was ever a dispute about that, the board would have no way of resolving it," he said.

Carol Oukrop, journalism school professor, chaired the board for

Washburn to become full state university under restructuring

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The House Select Committee on Higher Education delivered on its promise, preparing to present to Speaker Tim Shallenburger an ambitious and certain-to-be-controversial plan for restructuring the governance of post-secondary education in Kansas.

The plan would make Washburn University a full state university by July 1, 2000, and includes the largest increase in new funding for higher education in state history.

Under the select committee's proposal, the state's present six universities, Washburn, 19 community colleges and 11 vocational-technical schools would get about $138 million more in the next four years than presently projected in normal increases — and nearly $50 million of that would go for property-tax relief.

"It will contain the disclaimer that it is a work in progress, not a draft plan," said Rep. David Adkins, R-Leawood, chairman of the select committee, characterizing the document prepared by the panel.

It won unanimous voice endorsement by the committee, and it is the basic plan that was to be handed later Monday to Shallenburger. It is expected to wind up in bill form later this month.

Shallenburger created the select committee because an interim study committee failed to develop a restructuring plan, and the speaker is intent on overhauling higher education governance this legislative session.

If voters approve a constitutional amendment at the August primary election, the present nine-member Kansas Board of Regents would be replaced with an 11-member Council of Higher Education that would have governance authority over seven state universities — adding Washburn — and would have coordinating authority over the two-year community colleges and vo-tech schools.

The present State Board of Education would continue to run kindergarten-through-12th grade education.

The select committee has scheduled meetings in 15 cities of Kansas that have universities or community colleges Thursday through Saturday to solicit response from the public and the con-

ANIMAL APPETITES

Zoo keepers consider nutritional needs of animals

The Sunset Zoological Park food-preparation room looks like a kitchen in any restaurant.

At first sight, Kimberly Smith, zoo keeper, appears to be a chef. Each morning, she is surrounded by fresh and frozen meats, vegetables, fruits and condiments. With gloved hands, she prepares a specific dish from a restaurant-style recipe book for each animal at the zoo.

The walk-in freezer and shelves are stocked with jelly, mustard, fish, fruit juice and just about anything else a typical restaurant would have.

All of this is part of the relatively new regulations for animal diets at zoos, Scott Shoemaker, zoo director, said.

"Nutritional needs of specific animals must be considered," Shoemaker said. "About 20 or 30 years ago, we were feeding animals only food off the shelves and from farms. Now some zoos have full-time nutritionists on staff."

Shoemaker said animal diets are very specific, and there are different nutritional requirements for each animal. The zoo attempts to replicate the diets they would get in the wild, he said.

In order to keep certain animals, the zoo must be able to finance the specific nutritional needs of each animal.

"If zoos are accredited by the American Zoo and Aquarium Association, they review your animal collection and diets," Shoemaker said. "If you want red pandas, you must ship in bamboo."

Carnivores require an unusual horse-meat product in their diet. The meat is ground up with bones and fur, just as an animal would find it in the wild, he said.

Each different carnivore requires specific vitamin and nutrient additions to this horse-meat product. There are specific products for canines, felines and other meat-eating animals, Shoemaker said.

This carnivore meal comes frozen in three-foot tubes and looks like any meat product at the grocery store. It is thawed in hot water before consumption, like meat at home.

The zoo-food industry includes companies like Purina, offering rhino-diet, ostrich-diet, bird-of-prey-diet and many other unusual name-brand products, Shoemaker said.

Not too long ago, zoos accepted rotten produce and meat from different restaurants and individuals around town. That has changed, Shoemaker said.

"We get half a dozen phone calls a year from people who clean out their fridge," he said. "Animals would get sick and die from food poisoning, just like people. If it's not fit for human consumption, it's not fit for animal consumption."

"We don't take junk anymore," he said. Shoemaker said the zoo just cannot afford to take chances with endangered species.

Iceberg lettuce was once a staple among most zoo animals' diets. But studies have shown it has the nutritional value of crunchy water, he said.

Zoos have become better educated about nutrition for animals, Shoemaker said, and new regulations have had a positive effect on zoo animals. Fewer animals get sick now, he said.

"We get a healthier animal and better reproduction rates," he said.

Shoemaker said cheetahs had very low reproduction rates in zoos at one time. They were being fed feline food, just like any other feline. It turned out that they were very sensitive to a hormone in the product.

"It was like putting them on the birth control pill," he said.

Cheetahs are now given a canine diet, and reproduction rates are much higher, he said.

Shoemaker said the zoo is also practicing behav-

K-STATE TODAY

Bomb threat interrupts dance at Union; no injuries in evacuation, no real bomb

The Riley County Police Department received a threat Sunday that a bomb was at the K-State Student Union.

At 1 a.m. Sunday, RCPD was notified by an anonymous source that a couple of people were going to a dance in the Union to "blow up the place," said Sgt. Troy Lane, investigator for the K-State Police.

Delta Sigma Theta sorority was having a dance at Union Station.

Campus police evacuated the Union and searched the area. They didn't find anything.

Jack Connaughton, associate director of the Union, said he doesn't try to second guess a bomb threat.

"The Union is open to the communities and families. This takes away from the opportunities the Union is trying to give out," Connaughton said. "The more we acknowledge something like this, the more whoever the person is who's doing it feels they can do it again."

He also said the Union has had bomb threats in the past, but most threats are directed at academic buildings. No one has been arrested in the case.

Aggieville bar owner faces prison time, fines for lack of liquor license if guilty

Three employees of an Aggieville bar could each face up to 90 days in prison and $500 fines if convicted of operating an open saloon, Sheila Walker, spokesperson for Alcoholic Beverage Control, said.

Walter Glover, 34, owner of Karrington Club, and two employees, Michelle Snyder, 21, and Frankie C. Rivera, 29, were arrested Thursday night by the Riley County Police Department and ABC officers.

Karrington Club was previously known as Bomber's. Walker said the new management hadn't acquired a proper license to sell alcohol, a process that involves $1,050 and an application that usually takes a week to complete.

Operating an open saloon is a misdemeanor, Walker said. The ABC had acted on a tip that the bar was selling without a license, and two liquor buys were completed before the arrest, she said.

The previous owners' license for the bar expired Jan. 9, she said.

3 injured in auto wreck Monday night; fault undetermined by police at scene

Three people, two of them K-State students, were sent to the hospital late Monday night after a traffic accident at the corner of Manhattan Avenue and Claflin Road.

The accident, which took place at 8:44 p.m., primarily involved two vehicles that collided in the intersection. The two cars had significant damage, and a third vehicle was struck by one of the cars after it rebounded from impact.

Hank Nelson, a Riley County Police Department shift supervisor on the scene, said it was too early to determine who was at fault.

"It's just speculation at this point," Nelson said. "We really don't know an awful lot right now."

The third vehicle was not directly involved in the accident and had what appeared to be limited damage.

"It just happened to be in the wrong place at the wrong time," Nelson said.

Andrea Holmes, Daniel Vandongne and Sarah Straub were transported to Mercy Health Center on College Avenue for treatment of what paramedics on the scene classified as minor injuries, Nelson said. Holmes is a freshman in environmental design, and Vandongne is a sophomore undecided.

WORLDREPORT

U.S. plans to beef up Kuwait defenses; Albright says Iraqi invasion not planned

AL-JABER AIR BASE, Kuwait — The Pentagon is sending up to 3,000 troops to Kuwait — tripling U.S. ground forces in the country — "to discourage any creative thinking" by Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein.

At the same time, Secretary of State Madeleine Albright ruled out any massive military invasion of Iraq. "The administration does not agree with those who suggest we should deploy hundreds of thousands of American troops to engage militarily in a ground war in Iraq," Albright said in a speech in Washington, D.C.

The latest deployment of U.S. ground forces was disclosed by a senior military official traveling in the region with Defense Secretary William Cohen. He said up to 3,000 troops from Fort Hood, Texas, will be sent to Kuwait in the next 10 days or so to help defend Iraq's southern neighbor.

"The purpose is to ensure the security of Kuwait," the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Although Cohen had not formally signed the deployment order, a Pentagon official said Monday "the forces have been requested and that request is being considered and processed."

They will join 1,500 Army troops who have been using M1-A1 tanks, armored Bradley troop carriers and other vehicles during a scheduled exercise in the desert emirate. The United States deployed 541,000 ground troops during the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

The armored vehicles were stored in Kuwait after the Gulf War and have been used repeatedly by U.S. troops in training exercises.

For its part, Iraq appeared to be preparing for a U.S. attack. Troops of Saddam's elite Republican Guard, for instance, were being scattered throughout the country in an effort to ensure his government remains in power, Iraqi travelers arriving in Jordan said.

Iraq also dispatched diplomats to several Arab countries that joined the United States-led coalition in the Gulf War, seeking their support.

Cohen flew about 50 miles outside Kuwait City on Monday to visit this desert air base, which is surrounded by the broken and bombed-out remains of concrete bunkers hit by U.S. strike aircraft in 1991 after the Iraqi invasion.

"You are the best and the brightest America has to offer," Cohen told the crowd of mostly U.S. Air Force men and women.

"You are great warriors and diplomats."

LT. GOV. GARY SHERRER DISCUSSED HIS IDEAS ON LEADERSHIP AND SERVICE AS A PART OF NATIONAL MORTAR BOARD WEEK. HE SAID ONE OF THE KEYS TO MAKING KANSAS A STRONGER STATE IS LEADERSHIP.

Character, courage, commitment and vision are the qualities of a strong leader, Lt. Gov. Gary Sherrer said in a speech Monday.

Sherrer discussed his ideas on leadership and service as a part of National Mortar Board Week. He said he thought this topic was important for everyone to consider.

"I can think of no topic more important than leadership," Sherrer said.

Sherrer is the first lieutenant governor appointed in Kansas — previous lieutenant governors were elected. He also serves as Secretary of Commerce and Housing. He said one of the keys to making Kansas a stronger state is leadership.

"The state can't make communities worse or better. We can't pass enough laws to foul up a town or make it better. We are what we want to be. Most problems are a result of poor decisions or lack of leadership," he said.

Sherrer defined character as the possession of qualities such as honesty, decency and the compassion to serve others. He said leadership is a quality each individual can control.

"One of the basics of being good leaders is totally in our hands," Sherrer said. "Leaders generally make themselves."

Even though character is important, Sherrer said character without courage is hollow.

"Courage has to be a part of leadership, because you will be ridiculed if you're leading through change. Everyone will attack change at the onset," he said.

Sherrer said most of the important changes that happen are rejected at first. Leadership would be easy if leaders could go along with the majority, but Sherrer said leaders shouldn't be afraid to express unpopular opinions.

"I get in trouble all the time. The governor cringes every time I go out because he doesn't know what I'm going to say," he said.

Having courage to stand up for what you believe in also takes commitment to your cause, he said.

"Leadership is hard work that takes dedication and commitment. You have to have a passion for what you're doing," Sherrer said.

Vision was the final leadership element. Sherrer said leaders should have a positive outlook on the future.

"We get discouraged, and leaders say we have a chance to be better," he said. "Leaders move us from fear to hope."

Sherrer said experiences outside the classroom were important to college students interested in developing leadership skills.

"Classes are a critical part of the university, but people are strengthened and become better when they broaden their experiences. Internships and being involved in organizations are important," he said.

Sarah Basore, leadership team chairwoman for Mortar Board, said she felt Sherrer was a perfect addition to the honorary's week.

"We have three ideals — scholarship, leadership and service. This week is designed to promote our ideals, and we felt Sherrer exemplified all three," Basore said.

Marcia Boese of Manhattan, a University of Kansas Mortar Board alumna who attended the presentation, said Sherrer's comments about leadership were accurate.

"What he talked about was true. You have to develop those qualities if you want to lead, because what you say won't always be popular," Boese said.

Airport hopes to expand with 2 new airlines

JAMI BOYLES
Kansas State Collegian

TWA Express and American Eagle could soon be flying in — and out — of Manhattan. Manhattan Regional Airport will be requesting the service of the two airlines later this month.

The airport is served only by USAirways Express. Airport Director Kenneth Black said TWA Express and American Eagle would offer an increase in service to areas around the United States, including prominent hubs at St. Louis Lambert Field and Dallas-Fort Worth International.

The decision to pursue other airlines for the Manhattan terminal was prompted by declining ticket sales and a lack of market share in the area, according to a recent air-service analysis.

"There has been a very well-defined slide in passenger movements here since the 1980s," Black said.

The airport must actively seek out airlines that will serve Manhattan-area needs, Airport Advisory Board member Richard Hayter said.

"Small airports have to be proactive in going to the airlines to show them the potential," Hayter said.

The airport hired a consulting firm last year to estimate Manhattan's flying potential, with the goal of encouraging airlines to come into the area.

The analysis tracked air-travel movements of travelers in the seven-county area surrounding Manhattan, using data from several airports.

The results showed service to St. Louis Lambert Field — a prominent hub — would capture 73 percent of the market demand. Dallas-Fort Worth International would also capture a large percentage of the market, Black said.

The airport captures only 13 to 14 percent of the market with USAirways Express, Black said.

He said the airline is being encouraged to offer customers more options than just USAirways in Kansas City, Mo.

The two additional airlines were chosen not just because they service these hubs, but also because of their type of aircraft, availability of seating and ability to make a profit in the area, Black said.

If the airport is successful in its pitch to the airlines, Black said Manhattan could see the results within 90 days to a year.

He said the new airlines would have to bring in aircraft, hire employees and lease space. This would increase the number of flights out of Manhattan and help to lower ticket prices.

"We have an excellent chance," Black said. "I base that on what I've seen in other cities."

K-State chemists learn glass blowing

KELLY REDDING
Kansas State Collegian

The Department of Chemistry is offering a glass-blowing class as part of its curriculum for spring semester.

Taught by Jim Hodgson, senior master glass blower, the class is offered for a one-hour credit.

Hodgson, who has been a glass blower for four years, has 13 students enrolled to take his class.

The class is listed as Chemistry 600, or Scientific Glass Blowing, and it mainly focuses on making bends and seals in glass tubing and pipes. Hodgson said his classes are usually small, around four to five people, and most of the students are seniors or graduate students in chemistry.

Part of the class is a lecture by Hodgson, usually discussing types of pipes and tubes. Techniques such as making a bend, u-bend, side seal or t-seal are also covered. Students then watch as he demonstrates the different techniques.

"I want the students to have fun in this class," Hodgson said. "Once you complete a project, you can be proud of what you've made. It sort of becomes functional art."

Hodgson said most students take the class because they will be dealing with glass tools throughout most of their careers. Glass blowing will allow them to fix things such as broken test tubes or flasks.

Kristian Fried, graduate student in chemistry, said he likes the class because it's fun and educational.

"The class is pretty cool," he said. "I will always be working with glassware in whatever I do. If it breaks, I will be able to fix it."

For the final project, the students will have to make a maze out of glass tubing. The maze will have to include 15 bends, five seals and five round bottoms.

Once the project is finished, a little glass ball will be dropped into the tubing. In order to pass the project, the ball must pass through all the tubing without being restricted.

Board of Student Publications needs revamping

All parties seem to agree on one point: The Board of Student Publications needs restructuring and the bylaws need clarification and further definition. The board acts as publisher for the Collegian, Royal Purple yearbook and Campus Directory. As the corporate board that hires the editor in chief and manager of each publication, its actions should be in the best interest of each product and the students it serves. Once chosen, the editor or manager hires a staff and sets policy. The 102-year tradition of student-run publications at K-State should be retained without exception. However, the way the board operates — who serves on the board, the role they play in personnel issues and their ability to file grievances or express concerns — needs to be clarified. A weak constitution helps no one. The role of the board is not to be adversarial with its publications. It serves as a check-and-balance system but, above all, a strong board should be a reflection of strong publications. In restructuring, the board should look at removing individuals with a conflict of interest. Board members serving in another capacity on Student Senate or within Student Publications Inc. should not be on the board. The filing deadline for candidates is Friday. The board needs leaders who are interested more in student publications than in accomplishing a political agenda. President Jon Wefald: Your sensitive faculty appointments to this board play an integral role. In choosing the next presidential appointments, choose wisely and find individuals who are not political campus figures. Board: If your intent in voting to vacate the position of director was truly restructuring, then focus your energy on that. If you are staying true to the wording of your motion, then work to revamp and restructure the board. If the vote to remove Ron Johnson was based on his performance, please say so. The introduction of disinterested, third-party professionals might speed mediation and efficient restructuring of this board. The board should consider this as an option.

Wind wagons ho for the Kansas prairie wildlife safari

Where the rhinodeer and the cowtelope play, modern life is a breeze.

The Midwest is an expanse of mostly natural, relatively untouched wilderness, interrupted by the occasional town or farm. But the wildest beasts that roam its amber waves are the starving coyote and the rare and elusive killer Holstein. Rural America has lost its fear of the feral.

What if we spiced up the biosphere just a little? Kansas needs a tourism magnet. C'mon, we can rest on our laurels of the world's biggest ball of twine and the sundry "Wizard of Oz" diversions sprinkled about the state only so long. Eventually Nebraska will develop an even bigger ball of twine, we'll lose the twine race, and then where will we be?

Picture this: Prairie Safari! Remember a nobler, more heroic time? Let's set the wayback machine for ancient Greece, during the exploits of the Olympians.

Their menageries were much more complex, with manticores, basilisks, griffins and minotaurs out the Hellenistic wazoo. This was the age when Zeus was bedding females in every conceivable form from a swan to a Smith-Corona typewriter, so no wonder it was the golden age of crossbreeding.

Every lethal animal had somehow mated with every other lethal animal (truly, the world's most dangerous game) producing everything from fire-breathing winged lions to napalm-spitting hedgehogs. All was fine and good until the ascent of Hercules and his ilk — heroes defined by their body count, occasionally that of the poorly armed human hordes dumb enough to stand in their way, but often of the animals doing nothing more than guarding their own territory.

But, hey, the head of a sheep with the head of a turtle is worth more if it's the last sheep with the head of a turtle.

"Greek conservation" being what it was (or, more accurately, wasn't), none of those magical creatures survived to this day. But we can rebuild them. We have the technology — almost. Gene splicing might be just on the cutting edge, but embryonic surgery has already produced such hybrid animals — "chimeras" — from poultry. But it's hard to pack up the kids and drive three and a half hours to see hybrid poultry. There are other things to do, even in Kansas.

Should a Prairie Safari attraction ever be built, the beasts should be exciting and new, but we shouldn't be content with settling for re-creating the legendary beasts that terrorized the Mediterranean two millennia ago. Let's make the chimeric critters of Prairie Safari be indigenous to the Midwest — they would have been, if they'd existed in the first place.

Let us forge the legend of the squirow — half squirrel, half cow. Delight as it gathers grain for the winter and stores it in a nearby tree, bouncing from limb to limb with angelic precision. Marvel as it grazes and shakes its large fuzzy tail in the lazy Kansas afternoon sun. Be the first person on your block to watch a stampede go up a tree.

(OK, so that's not much of a tourist draw, either. It's just a personal favorite. Please, indulge me.)

After populating the prairie with herds of squirows, we can fuse an opossum and a meadowlark and create the opossowlark, the only bird to play dead in midair. Beware the flocks of rattlesheep. Or perhaps for a potential house pet, the beagleconstrictor: it can sit, stay, fetch and swallow your neighbor's Geo.

Obviously we're looking past Prairie Safari here — people will want chimeras for their own home and dining pleasure. Who can resist the lure of owning their own guinea cow herd, mooing its way through a bed of cedar chips? Imagine a cage of chillakeets, birds that chirp melodiously and are plush and soft to the touch. For the ultimate house pet, invest in peacats, felines who spread their tails and strut in your face while you try to read the paper.

There are inevitable downsides to this gene-splicing frenzy. The military certainly would want to paralyze the Persian Gulf with a pod of prickly porcuwhales. Land battles could be won with the force of a cheetaphant. And let's not let them get anywhere near seagulls.

So maybe it's not the best idea since spray cheese. Maybe I can't get someone to plunk down my estimated $18.7 billion to fund Prairie Safari. But it's a shame the plumbing world will never know the utility of a ferretdillo, and a child will never cuddle the plush fur of a bunnybear. At least we'll never see a real jayhawk.

SGA influence marks Johnson's removal

Editor,
I nearly fell out of my chair last night while reading the article "SGA not involved with board's decision."

What a bunch of malarkey. If the board's decision revolved around Ron Johnson's actions at a Privilege Fee Committee meeting last fall, then Student Governing Association is involved in a very big way.

Last spring, Johnson came to the Privilege Fee Committee meeting with a budget proposal for the Student Publications equipment fee. After much discussion, the Privilege Fee Committee decided to endorse a bill to fund such a proposal.

The proposal called for borrowing some state money in order to fund the project over a four year period. (A similar proposal was passed in 1993 for a similar equipment purchase.) It was a good proposal.

In fact, it passed Student Senate easily. However, several months later, many senators suddenly became "confused" about how long of a loan period the bill had been written for.

Even though it was made clear in debate that the loan was for four years, confusion prevailed.

Never mind that I wrote the bill verbatim to match the proposal that was done four years previous.

Rather than to fix the problem with an amendment or an exception, Senate continued to be confused and decided that the loan should be for only two years.

In essence, they cut the equipment fee funding in half.

In my opinion, Johnson had every right to be angry at that committee meeting.

He did his job well in presenting a well justified, well laid-out proposal.

However, the student government system let him down.

Rather than admit the mistake it made and make a bona fide attempt to rectify it, Senate was content with admitting a clerical error, nothing more.

It's time that members of Senate wake up and realize Senate is not just another pretty thing to fill a few lines on the resumé.

It does influence the campus, and in this case, people.

Johnson is a good person, and I hate to see Senate let this kind of injustice prevail.

Holiday should celebrate loved ones, not commercialism

Feb. 14 is almost here. Valentine's Day. The most popular day to celebrate the loves of our lives.

It has become too commercial. I don't feel that way because I'm unattached. If you knew my last knucklehead, you'd know why I'm happily and comfortably single.

Flowers, candy, passion. It's the stuff Valentine's Day is made of. It's hard enough doing it right. Men are cautioned against buying the wrong thing and at the last minute. What about women? Do they play an equal role in celebrating their sweetie? Do women buy flowers, or gifts or dinner? Some do. But rumor has it that if the guy doesn't get it right, the girl won't be his girl much longer.

A day after Christmas displays go down, up pop the Valentine's Day decorations. Red everything for as far as the eye can see. Those novelty heart candies that once read "Be Mine" now say "Fax Me." Single people save up hundreds of dollars to send themselves roses, just so they won't feel left out. Not that I've ever done this, of course.

Commercialization has made Valentine's Day too restrictive. It's regarded only as a day of love between boyfriends and girlfriends or husbands and wives. We've lost sight of what it really means. It means more than Feb. 14. And it means more than having roses that don't last, candy that makes you hyperactive, and dinner you can't pronounce.

It means celebrating how people love and respect one another every day. Not just a boyfriend, girlfriend, husband or wife, but family and friends. They were there long before you found true romance.

The relationship I have with my father is a perfect example. We're not only estranged, we're extinct. In many ways it's because of Valentine's Day. As a child of divorce, it's not unusual to blame one parent for the demise of the family. I blamed the wrong one. For many years I was mad at Mom when it should have been Dad. That misguided anger cost me years of a loving relationship with Mom. Now, though, we enjoy a mother-daughter relationship that would make any women's magazine proud. Now I realize every day, not just Valentine's Day, that she's the bomb.

Whether or not your mother is in your life, remember her on Valentine's Day, and every day after that. I'm almost 30 years old and mine still sends me underwear. That's the kind of love worth celebrating year-round. And for people who have great relationships with their fathers, you go! Remember him, too.

During the rough times with Mom, I lived with my grandparents. Having raised three children of their own, it was a big undertaking for them to rear a rebellious 14-year-old. They must have thought of themselves as crazy for having to deal with me at their age. But with nowhere else for me to go, they "Valentine's Day'd" me. They loved me.

I yelled and screamed, and they yelled and screamed right back. And they still loved me. Eventually I would get that through my thick head. They, like my mom, only wanted the best for me. Their goal was to rid me of pent-up teenage angst and mold me into a happy young woman.

They succeeded. Although my grandfather died years ago, I still have my grandmother in my life. Sure, we get on each other's nerves, but that's proof that we love each other. We'll love each other this Valentine's Day and every day after that.

If you have grandparents in your life, I hope you realize how special they are. If not, you might want to do that before it's too late. If not grandparents, maybe an aunt, an uncle or a cousin. The love of your family is better than any box of Godiva chocolates.

I'm not a crazy old maid who doesn't believe in relationships. I've had pretty decent ones. The ones that are good and healthy, that maybe include some arguing, are unique. Some last a few months, others many years. Relationships among family and friends, however, last many lifetimes.

I've had many acquaintances, but by choice, few close friends. That's because I'm an only child, and I've cultivated a nice web of solitude and independence. Or else I'm spoiled.

The close friends I do have, though, are ones worth thinking about every day, not just on Valentine's Day.

My best friend was a teen-age mother. Rather than relying on the system, she single-handedly raised a delightful, intelligent child. She's done so while working on her own late-start education.

After 17 years, and 2,000 miles between us, we still make time for each other. That's the kind of friendship that survives you, your children and their children.

I've realized over time how important family and friends can be. I've known people who have lost children or spouses. Every day, not just Valentine's Day, will be hard for them. And because they're our family or our friends, it will be hard for us, too.

In the midst of your personal celebration, how about taking a minute to tell someone going through a rough time that you're there for them? There might be nothing you can do to take away the pain. Availing yourself, though, might bring them some peace.

I still believe Valentine's Day is too commercialized. But I can't fault businesses for wanting to make money. If there's any fault, it's in not taking advantage of what's around you.

Life is too short. Instead of wooing someone for one day, woo them, in your own way, every day.

And don't just woo someone with whom you hope to get lucky. Loving and supporting family and friends, with whom there is no intimacy, guarantees happiness for life.

That's better than the roses and free meal I can buy for myself.

Church should stay away from evolution

Editor,

I read something in Tuesday's Collegian that disturbed me greatly — Jason Rucker's column on the misconceptions of evolution and creation.

First, I can see Rucker's thinking behind his reasons for saying that "time is relevant." However, if God did indeed use evolution to create the world, literally taking millions of years for each "day," then he is being very misleading in the Old Testament account.

This would undermine the premise that God is truth, which would render the Bible useless.

Furthermore, the translation of the word "day" used in the Genesis account refers to an actual, 24-hour period of time. You can tell this by the context — there is both a qualifier and a quantifier. This is repeated several times for emphasis. Also, if God worked for six days and rested on the seventh, creating a model for humans, does it make sense that he would work for six indefinite periods of millions of years and then rest on the seventh indefinite period of millions of years, expecting us to do the same?

Then how about this — according to the Bible, Adam was created on the sixth day. This means he lived through day six and day seven of creation. Yet, the Bible states that when Adam died, he was 930 years old.

How can a man live through two indefinite periods of millions of years and die at only 930? Either creation is speaking of literal days, or the Bible again loses credibility because God can't add.

Rucker speaks of the origins of man based on the typical theory of evolution, that is, over millions or billions of years of natural selection, life evolved from a single-celled organism and became what we are today. This is not possible, and Darwin himself knew it.

Darwin said this in the introduction of "The Origin of the Species," where he laid out his theory. There are many reasons that life couldn't have developed in this way, but due to the amount of space I have already taken, I won't go into it here.

However, I will say that the theory of evolution is on its way out. It is now being rejected by numerous well-known atheists and former evolutionists, because it simply does not hold up to a close inspection of the laws of physics and chemistry. One reason for this is the lack of fossil record. Not one fossil of a transitional species has ever been found and confirmed.

As David B. Kitts, doctorate in zoology, said, "Evolution requires intermediate forms between species, and paleontology does not provide them."

I'm not trying to create another religious debate. I simply don't want to see the church in general embrace evolution as any part of the creation of the world. The church, which is founded in the precepts put forth by God, should accept creation and creation alone, because that's what God said.

Look what happened when Columbus discovered the New World. At that time, the church had agreed with the scientific community that Earth was flat.

When this was discovered to be false, the church suffered a great humiliation. The same happened when it was proven that Earth was not the center of the universe.

In fact, the church had excommunicated certain members of the scientific community for saying that our solar system was heliocentric.

My point is this — science, in its quest for knowledge, will eventually prove evolution wrong. If the church has embraced it, what happens then?

The church will once again face public humiliation, especially because it has denied what God himself has said in black and white, in favor of an unproven theory put forth by humanity. I, for one, don't want to see that happen.

Having an open mind is good, but not so open that your brain, or your beliefs, fall out.

Alumnus encourages board to review facts

Editor,

When I attended K-State, the Collegian was always available somewhere on campus or in Aggieville.

The Collegian was always available because students worked all day and stayed late into the night editing, rewriting copy and generating headlines.

Always helping the students — challenging, encouraging and pointing out ways the writing and editing could be better — was a man named Ron Johnson. Most of us who worked at the Collegian would go to the Collegian office and find Johnson's comments about the work we did in bringing information to the K-State and Manhattan community.

If something has been said in the Privilege Fee Committee meeting that has rubbed someone the wrong way, might you be encouraged to sit down, drink a cup of coffee, read the Collegian and have some patience.

Review the facts, get some more information, cool off and make a fair, informed decision. And remember, you get much of your information from the Collegian.

Board asked to give reasons for dismissal

Editor,

People in public positions are most effective when operating in a forthright manner.

Members of the Board of Student Publications might restore their credibility by explaining why they chose to fire Director of Student Publications Ron Johnson. Vague muttering about "unhappiness" with his performance isn't enough to justify damaging his career.

Those who voted against Johnson should drop their no-comment stance and give specific reasons that can be debated and judged on their merits.

Continued silence lends credibility to Johnson's assertion that he was refusing to muzzle the Collegian.

If, in fact, those board members feel their complaints won't stand up to public scrutiny, I suggest they restore Johnson to his position.

Tom Carlin, class of 1972
Member, K-State Journalism Advisory Committee

Reader thinks board has too much power

Editor,

Oh, how President Clinton would love to have people with the power and the inclination of the K-State Board of Student Publications in his corner right now. President Reagan and President Bush would have wished for the same during the Iran-Contra days, and of course, President Nixon could have used the same kind of help during Watergate.

Administrators, government officials and a raft of other people would give their eyeteeth to have that kind of power — the power of attempting to control what's published in a newspaper.

Fortunately, the Constitution doesn't allow it. Our form of government, indeed our society, depends on an informed populace. Our way of life, our government, our freedoms would not survive in an atmosphere where newspapers were not allowed to operate freely, without fear of censorship, without fear of retribution from those who would like to keep a lid on things.

These basics are important for the country and should be embraced in a university setting.

Student journalists should be free to cover the university with the same vigor and the same freedoms that guarantee the non-academic press the right to cover the country and the world with only the restraints and safeguards guaranteed by law.

Ron Johnson, like his predecessors in the post of director of Student Publications, has fought fiercely for these principles.

No doubt he has angered and offended those who would have it otherwise, those who would exercise control over what student journalists write about and publish in the Collegian and other publications.

To give such people the power to abolish his position is ludicrous, and it is dangerous to the freedom of thought and expression that should be part and parcel of an academic institution that wants to be known for its excellence.

The position of director of Student Publications should be restored, the Board of Student Publications should be revamped and peopled with those who understand the importance of a free and unfettered press, and Johnson and the K-State journalism students and faculty should be allowed to get back to the business at hand — training journalists to function in a free society.

Complex needs to let technology be used

Editor,

I am a resident in Jardine Terrace Apartments. I bought a TV satellite receiver this month, and I would like to put the small dish on the roof of my building.

Actually, I just put it there. I won't do any damage to the building, not even a nail hole. I thought this was allowed before I bought the receiver, because Jardine's regulations do not say this is not allowed. The regulations just mention installing an outdoor antenna is not allowed. (I can provide a copy of the regulations.) In addition, I have seen someone in Jardine install a satellite dish before and use it for more than one year.

Jardine Housing Coordinator Christina E. Sanchez told me that is not allowed. She asked me to submit a letter to her office.

I did that, and they said they will discuss the problem. But she said the result is probably no.

I wrote to you because I think that with technology developing so fast, using a TV satellite receiver or satellite receiver for the Internet is becoming more common. K-State is one of the top-100 wired universities in the United States. We are proud of this. The people at K-State should be able to enjoy this technology. So I would greatly appreciate the Jardine Committee considering this situation, changing the regulations and allowing people to make use of technology on the condition that they not damage the building. This will greatly benefit all Jardine residents.

Board's actions need to be more balanced

Editor,

After reading a recent e-mail solicitation requesting nominations for excellence in teaching, I logged into "The award-winning student newspaper that chronicles the life at K-State" World Wide Web site to catch up on campus events.

As you might be able to imagine, I was surprised and a little embarrassed to read the story regarding the vote by the Board of Student Publications. The story was well balanced; however, the board's actions seemed less so.

In short, the board's behavior appears to be rather more than less politically tainted. Maybe a proper course of action would be to elect the Student Publications adviser during the next campus elections.

Humor aside, I had the opportunity to work with Director of Student Publications Ron Johnson through the Kansas Association of Collegiate Press when I also served as a student publications adviser. And, in my opinion, K-State couldn't have been served better.

To close, K-State seems to have excellence in journalism thanks to Johnson, students and the faculty.

Also, rewarding excellence is something we are proud of.

Therefore the board should clarify or reconsider its vote, or the university should put this matter behind it by providing Johnson with the authority, stability and reward to continue the "award-winning program."

Johnson respected as adviser by colleague

Editor,

Abhorrent (adj.) 1. Disgusting. 2. Arousing extreme repugnance. 3. (Archaic.) Very strongly opposed. 4. Action taken by the K-State Board of Student Publications to effectively fire Ron Johnson by vacating the position of director of Student Publications Inc., which he has had for several years.

I have known Johnson professionally for about nine years.

We have served College Media Advisers Inc., our professional organization, together in various capacities since he was teaching and advising at Fort Hays State University.

He is considered to be one of the best and most respected student media advisers in the nation, as is evidenced by K-State publication awards and professional journalists K-State publications have produced.

As my daughter approaches those college selection years, I would be proud to have her attend K-State with Johnson as her teacher, adviser and friend.

How this board can throw away valuable resources such as Johnson and my daughter is beyond me.

A reconsideration of this decision is required.

Collegian support appreciated by lab

Editor,

I would like to thank the Collegian and Sheryl Williams for the Feb. 9 article on the Electronics Design Laboratory. It is important to our mission that news of the EDL reach all of the faculty at K-State.

The EDL is a first-class facility because of the efforts and contributions of a significant number of people in the College of Agriculture, the College of Arts and Sciences, the College of Engineering, the Office of the Vice President for Administration and Finance, and the Office of the Vice Provost for Research.

These organizations provided financial support and valuable oversight during the lab's start-up period and are continuing to support the EDL. I would also like to thank the staff and students working in the EDL.

Their dedication and considerable effort built the foundation on which the EDL stands. They deserve to be proud of the lab they created.

Snyder humbles self, exalted by reader

Editor,

There is a man on this campus who is the leader of one of the most successful organizations in the history of K-State. Yet, this man will not tell anyone else of his success.

He is a man willing to sit in the shadows and watch his people get the glory. He is not prone to boasting or stepping into the limelight. He is perfectly content to sit beside his wife and watch. There is a verse in the Bible that sums this man up perfectly.

"Whoever exalts himself will be humbled and he who humbles himself will be exalted." (Luke 14:11)

The mastermind of the K-State football team, Bill Snyder, is this man.

The 1997-98 K-State football team was presented with the 27th annual Fiesta Bowl championship trophy on Jan. 28 during the men's basketball game against Nebraska.

A small portion of the team, including the five co-captains, took the court to receive the trophy. Yet, not one coach could be found. This ceremony was a fine display of sportsmanship.

To many students, this might be a normal sight, but it is truly extraordinary. I have never seen such a humble man in the game of football, and it is not limited to the trophy ceremony. It includes off-season, practices and interviews. I have heard nothing but excellent marks come out of the mouths of his players, coaches and fans. This man is a huge asset to our campus. He will not exalt himself. Therefore, we must exalt him.

I challenge you to flood his office with phone calls, letters and e-mails expressing your thanks to him. Snyder and his coaching staff have replaced the pride in Wildcat football. Let's exalt him!

Board run by egos, unfair to Johnson

Editor,

I don't know Ron Johnson. I have never set foot inside the Collegian newsroom, nor have I ever sat inside a journalism classroom. I have, however, been on this campus long enough to be sick and tired of Student Governing Association and its offshoots (read: Board of Student Publications Inc.) attempting to wield God-like unchecked power and control.

Inasmuch as I can tell, the Board of Student Publications has failed in many ways. First, it failed to give Johnson due process. Second, it failed to consult with anyone most affected by its recent decision — the journalism students themselves. For if it did, it would have encountered overwhelming support for Johnson in this battle. Lastly, it has failed us, the K-State community as a whole.

These board members, none of whom have any connection to the Collegian and how it must be run, might have succeeded in running one of the most effective and popular faculty members out of town.

Indeed, it appears that there simply isn't room enough in this town for both a truly wonderful teacher and the big-headed, self-important, way-too-much-power-wielding board.

What a shame it is to allow egos not only to ruin a great teacher and adviser, but to jeopardize the future and great tradition of our student newspaper.

Are we in academia no longer concerned about learning, but rather concerned only with the bottom line? If this is the case, why are we all here anyway?

Best hope for U.S. medal in luge finishes 6th

Wendel Suckow's last Olympics weren't a total loss.

Suckow, America's best hope for a medal in the luge, finished sixth in the singles competition. Afterward, he proposed to his girlfriend, Kim Fuhmann, and gave her a diamond ring.

He had kept the ring in his backpack in the athletes' waiting room during his two runs Monday. Fuhmann said yes, and now an August wedding is planned.

Fuhmann manages a clothing store in Lake Placid, N.Y. Suckow, whose third Olympics were his last, probably will become a coach with the U.S. luge team.

Japan warns Olympic guests of gangs, mobs

City officials want Olympic visitors to enjoy the sights and sports. And while they're at it, beware of organized crime.

In "The Guide to Nagano," published by one of Japan's largest newspapers, guests are urged to show their solidarity with Japanese police by patronizing only those bars, restaurants, hotels and stores that have posted anti-organized-crime stickers in their windows.

In English, the stickers proclaim: "We have NO relations with YAKUZA," the generic Japanese word for gangsters.

Police estimate there are 42 yakuza gangs in Nagano, with about 1,000 members operating in the area.

The rival gangs usually target each other, but police official Shiroki Kinoshita is guarding against the following scenario: Out-of-town revelers would be sampling sushi or sipping sake at some nightclub when a group of drunken gangsters decides to bully a shop owner.

"We don't want guests to be exposed to that or endangered by it," he said.

Restrictions help Nagano traffic problems

Heavy restrictions on traffic during the Olympics got their first real test in a weekday rush hour Monday, and held up better than expected.

Traffic was actually lighter in some areas of town than usual, police said, reflecting increased use of carpools and buses.

Concerns about transportation during the games have been high because of Nagano's narrow, crowded streets and relatively poor mass transit system.

International Olympic Committee spokeswoman Michele Verdier said the roads remain an issue.

"Transportation is still a problem," she said. She added that organizers have promised to beef up the system.

Hockey crowd needs slowdown on rules

The new Olympic sport of women's hockey might not be the most popular ticket in town, but it gets high marks for trying.

Fans at Monday's match at the Aqua Wing arena, where Finland beat Japan 11-1, were told to be quiet for an important pre-game tip. The crowd, most of them rooting for the hometown Japanese, were then given a simple rundown on the basic rules of hockey on the large-screen video.

The crowd next was told to hush their cheers up so it was led by the game announcers in a round of "the wave." Several hundred Japanese schoolchildren at one end of the rink took to the wave with particular glee.

Fans also were reminded to take any of their trash home rather than leave it in the arena.

Official says China will wait for Olympic bid

China's top sports official said his country will bide its time in deciding whether to bid for a future Olympic Games.

"We will select the most appropriate time (to bid) according to the domestic and international situation. So whether it is in 2008, 2012 or 2016 will depend on the actual situation," Wu Shaoyu, member of the Communist Party Politburo and head of China's National Olympic Committee, told Kyodo News.

Beijing's bid to be host to the 2000 Olympics failed in 1993, losing to Sydney by one vote.

Wu also addressed the Chinese doping scandal at the World Swimming Championships in Perth, Australia, in January. He insisted that the four Chinese athletes who tested positive for the use of banned diuretics and the Chinese coach and athlete caught trafficking banned human growth hormones were isolated cases.

He praised the International Olympic Committee and Australia's National Olympic Committee for taking an "objective attitude" toward the scandal and criticized an "unfriendly" media for touching off a furor about the doping affair.

Women's super-G wiped out by heavy snow

HAKUBA, Japan — Some 8 more inches of snow overnight wiped out the women's super-G Tuesday morning, the third Alpine skiing race in as many days to be undermined by the weather.

Organizers still hoped to run the slalom portion of the men's combined event on Tuesday. It was postponed Monday because workers could not clear snow quickly enough from the course.

The postponement of the women's super-G, the event in which Picabo Street is to make her 1998 Olympic debut, means no medals in the Alpine events will be awarded until at least Wednesday — when the men's downhill is now scheduled.

The combined slalom is just half of the combined event, which also includes a downhill. The combined downhill is set for Thursday.

NATHAN LEEPER WAS MORE INTERESTED IN COLLEGE BASKETBALL THAN TRACK. BUT WITH A MARK OF 7-4 1/4 IN THE HIGH JUMP, HIS PRIORITIES CHANGED.

LEAPER LEEPER

JOEL WHITE
Kansas State Collegian

K-State has had its share of leapers.

Many Wildcat leapers, including 1996 Olympic high jump qualifier Ed Broxterman, 1993 NCAA Indoor high jump champion Percell Gaskins and 1996 all-America high jumper Itai Margalit have flourished at K-State.

In only his third meet as a Wildcat, a new leaper has already jumped into the record books — Nathan Leeper.

Staying true to his name, Leeper became the fifth-best indoor high jumper ever to wear a K-State uniform when he cleared 7-4 1/4 on Jan. 24 at the Iowa State Open.

The sophomore, who grew up on a ranch near Protection, Kan., learned how to high jump from his sister Kristi when he was 6 years old. Then his natural leaping ability took over.

At a young age, Leeper said people told him that his name and his talent went hand in hand.

"I started high jumping when I was fairly young," he said. "Before long, I started hearing at track meets that it's a good name for a high jumper."

As it turned out, Leeper's surname was quite prophetic. During his junior year in high school, he was one of five high school jumpers in Kansas who cleared the crossbar higher than 7 feet — a rarity in a state the size of Kansas.

In Leeper's senior year in high school, he failed to match his career best of 7-1 at the state championship, but still came away with the gold medal in the high jump. He also won the gold medal in triple jump that year. His junior season, he captured the gold medal in the high jump.

While in high school, Leeper received many Division I track scholarship offers. However, he said he decided to attend Dodge City Community College — not for track, but for basketball.

"I love basketball. I can't hardly go a day without playing," he said. "I turned down quite a few offers from Division I track programs for basketball. Some people said I was an idiot for it."

Leeper played basketball for only one semester at DCCC. He said he did not want to ruin his track career with an injury suffered in basketball, which he almost did after spraining both ankles.

Leeper said he has no regrets for going to DCCC for a year because it helped get most of the urge to play college basketball out of his system.

"I don't want to be 40 years old, sitting on the back porch, having a barbecue, and saying, 'I wish I would have tried playing basketball somewhere,'" he said.

After he signed with K-State for a track scholarship in April 1997, he said basketball was not entirely out of his system.

"I told myself that if I didn't do as good as I thought I was going to do, I was going to forfeit my track scholarship and walk on the basketball team," he said. "I don't think that's going to happen now."

I TOLD MYSELF THAT IF I DIDN'T DO AS GOOD AS I THOUGHT I WAS GOING TO, I WAS GOING TO FORFEIT MY TRACK SCHOLARSHIP AND WALK ON THE BASKETBALL TEAM. I DON'T THINK THAT'S GOING TO HAPPEN NOW.

NATHAN LEEPER
K-State high jumper

Something that Leeper said has plagued his high school and community college careers is that he never received knowledgeable high jump instructions.

"Up until this year, I just kind of learned on my own," he said. "I never had a high jump coach that knew anything about it at all. My high school coach was really a basketball coach, and my coach at Dodge was a distance runners coach."

"My coach at Dodge wasn't going to mess with it, he said anybody who can jump 7 feet 3 inches should just keep doing what he's been doing," he said.

Despite the lack of instruction, Leeper's one-year stint at DCCC was illustrious. He was undefeated in high jump during the indoor season, winning the NJCAA Indoor Championship with a jump of 7-3 3/4.

Leeper was twice defeated during the outdoor season — once by Itai Margalit, and once by his future teammate, Charles Burney.

Burney, who competed for Kansas City Kansas Community College, beat Leeper at the NJCAA Region VI meet, but Leeper paid him back at the NJCAA Outdoor Championships.

Leeper won the Outdoor Championship with a jump of 7-3 3/4. Through January, Leeper's 7-4 1/4 jump was the fourth highest jump in the nation this season. Although he is fourth in the nation, he is only second on his own team. Burney is tied for second in the nation after a jump of 7-4 1/2, which he accomplished at the K-State Allcomers meet on Dec. 6.

Both Leeper and Burney now have the luxury of training with an Olympic high jump qualifier, Broxterman, and Israel's top high jumper, Margalit.

Leeper said he is in awe of the expertise and experience of both Broxterman and Margalit.

"I just like to sit there and listen to them sometimes just to hear what they've got to say," he said.

After spending time with Olympians, Leeper said he has started thinking about his Olympic potential, but he is more interested in team titles than individual accomplishments.

"It's always in the back of your mind whether you will jump good enough at the right time. I'd just as soon see us win a conference championship," he said.

"I won a couple of individual national championships, but when you win with a team, it makes it that much better."

Snyder finishes recruiting knowing more work still lies ahead

VIEWPOINT

D. SCOTT FRITCHEN

Scott is a senior in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Scott at dsf7477@ksu.edu.

Don't ask Bill Snyder what he did during the aftermath of the Fiesta Bowl.

Don't ask him how he celebrated, who he was with, where he went or how he got there.

He doesn't know.

"I'm not sure I remember exactly what we did," he said. He rubbed his brow and laughed. He remembered accepting the Fiesta Bowl trophy. He remembered talking to the news media. He said he remembered the fiasco, as he called it — the block party more than 200,000 people attended until early morning, including Tempe natives, many of his coaches and all of his players.

Everyone remembers where they were during the Challenger explosion, the collapse of the Berlin Wall and the Oklahoma City bombing. This was the Fiesta Bowl. Snyder had won the biggest game of his career.

"I can't remember what we did," he finally said again. "I probably went back and watched the game on video tape."

This time, everybody laughed.

Yeah, it's February. March Madness is a glowing vision for the basketball team 70 miles east of Manhattan. Yeah, K-State won its first Big 12 Conference road game in almost two years.

For Snyder, it means just seven months before his biggest game, because as he says and repeats and emphasizes and repeats again, "every game is big."

It was Thursday, and Snyder sat at his press conference, and in one breath, he laughed at his brief memory lapse. In another, he unveiled the crop of 16 new football recruits.

For Snyder, this time of the year is big. This is where, as a football coach, the process starts all over again. New roster. New schedule. Nine months before another er chance to knock off Nebraska.

Snyder remembers everything before the Fiesta Bowl. He remembers the phone calls to 18-year-olds who just happen to run, throw, catch, kick and tackle better than anybody in the nation. He remembers the letters, the house calls, the after-dinner talks with parents, telling them he'd take care of their son.

Snyder doesn't like to finish second. Who does? Snyder knew he wanted top-notch players, athletes who could fit into his program. That's why when Snyder finished talking to a player, he also might talk with his teachers, family, friends, neighbors, schoolmates and girlfriend. Just to make sure.

Snyder remembers eight years ago, when kids didn't want to come to K-State because it lacked tradition. After five straight bowls, Snyder doesn't have to talk about success. Trouble is, the kids might not play for two or three seasons. But Snyder told them to have faith. He said when the opportunity arises, they'll get their shot. They ask when that will be. Snyder doesn't know.

"We've lost some battles for some youngsters based on that factor and that factor alone," he said.

That's the price you pay when you're good. Snyder knows K-State is at the level of Florida, Florida State, Nebraska, Ohio State and Penn State — the teams K-State

Track team gets more NCAA qualifying marks in Nebraska

JOEL WHITE
Kansas State Collegian

Despite torn cartilage in her left wrist, Renetta Seiler threw yet another automatic qualifying mark of 63-8 3/4 to win the weight throw on Saturday at the K-State-Nebraska-Abilene Christian triangular in Nebraska.

"She took a couple of soft throws this weekend, and she threw much shorter than her usual," K-State coach Cliff Rovelto said. "She's still not 100 percent yet."

Seiler, who has the second-best throw in the nation this season at 67-9, tore the cartilage in her left wrist on Jan. 24 at the Iowa State Open.

Seiler also won the shot put with a personal record, 47-10, a provisional qualifying mark for the NCAA Indoor Championships.

Anna Whitham achieved a personal record and a provisional qualifying mark at the meet, but it was still not enough to beat Seiler in the weight throw.

She topped her previous personal record of 56-3 in the weight throw with a toss of 57-6 1/2.

K-State high jumper Charles Burney matched his personal record and won the event with a jump of 7-4 1/2 — an automatic qualifying mark.

In the two meets before Saturday, Burney's best competition leaps have been 7-1 1/4 and 6-11 1/2 inches. Rovelto credited Burney's recent trouble to his approach.

"He's been struggling a little bit with his approach because he went a month without doing his approach," Rovelto said.

Rovelto said Burney's problem, which seemed to be solved after a 7-4 1/4 inch jump, is not unusual.

"You look at the national list, there are guys that have jumped 7 feet 7 or 7 feet 8, and they're doing 6 feet 10 right now," Rovelto said. "You just can't jump high every week."

K-State brought home two other gold medals from the meet — Emily Diederich in the 600-yard run and Brandon Jessop in the 3,000-meter run.

Rovelto said Diederich had a strong performance in winning the 600 with a time of 1:22.42.

"I thought Emily ran very well in the 600," Rovelto said. "She did it pretty much by herself. She led from start to finish."

Jessop won the 3,000-meter run with a time of 9:30.34 — more than 20 seconds faster than the second-place finisher, Nebraska's Marcus Witter.

joins as winning nine or more games in each of the past five seasons. And so, K-State finished second a couple of times during recruiting.

"Finishing second is far worse than entering the race sometimes," he said. "It can be a painful process."

But K-State got a steal. It stole Frank Murphy from the rest of the nation. Snyder used "very, very fine player" to describe Murphy, who was the best community-college running back in the nation. He used just one "very" to describe Michael Bishop's performance after the Fiesta Bowl. Draw your own conclusion.

Murphy is already enrolled at K-State. He knows he'll have his shot next season.

Snyder knows not to show too much enthusiasm yet. Back when 115 scholarships were available, recruiting was easier. Then the number dropped to 105, then 95. Now just 85 scholarships are available. Maintaining that perfect balance in players is an equation coaches try to solve during the off-season, but Snyder admits it's an impossible equation to solve. You're always going to be too thin or too deep in positions.

K-State has one fullback, Brian Goolsby. Instead of lining up another, K-State tried to recruit a quarterback, who figured five back-ups were enough for Bishop, and signed elsewhere.

Snyder is contemplating changes on the offensive line, switching this guy with that, that guy with this, and nobody knows what's going to happen with that.

For now, Snyder is just looking forward to spring practice the first week of April to begin preparing for the upcoming season.

Oh, and don't ask Snyder who K-State will face in its season opener.

He doesn't know that, either.

Author explains hippie ideals in new book

TODD PACEY
Kansas State Collegian

Doug De Bias was a hippie. He and others in his generation thought they would be the ones who would grow up and help lead a society out of ignorance and countless "isms." They did not, but De Bias has not given up hope.

In his book "Coming of Age in Babylon, Finding Your Own Reality," due out in April, De Bias explains these hippie ideals. According to the introduction, this book is for people between the ages of 18 and 25. However, De Bias said, these ideas must not be forgotten at 25, or we will end up just like the hippies.

De Bias tackles a range of subjects, from drugs to capitalism to religion to masturbation. They sometimes overlap and have similar solutions — do what you want, but do not harm others. People who smoke joints in the privacy of their own homes are more fair, not better, than people who speak out in the name of their religions against someone of a different sexual preference.

De Bias has an interesting and sarcastic take on why pot is illegal and alcohol is legal. Alcohol is more popular with the older generation, who are the ones who make the laws. Alcohol lets them forget they are set in their ways. Marijuana expands thinking, and these new viewpoints contradict their lifestyle. Even though pot is illegal, breaking this law does not harm anyone.

Likewise, homosexuality does not harm anyone. It is not unnatural. Homosexuality has been around for more than 5,000 years and is exhibited by animals other than humans. Some people base this prejudice on the Old Testament, which condemns this act. This same book condones slavery, approves of segregation of races and polygamy, and allows women to be the property of men. Can we say, hypocrisy?

"I wouldn't want to be accused of 'Incite to light,' when my only real offense is 'Incite to think for yourself' — a high crime enough as it is in this here society," De Bias wrote on the subject of drugs.

The message of his book is that we, the generation of the future, need to be the ones to stand against prejudices and stand up for individual rights. Everyone has the same rights, but not everyone is given these rights. De Bias explains this using the metaphor of rock-paper-scissors.

"There is usually someone better, prettier, smarter, stronger, tougher, and someone further down these comparative totem poles. So what. It's all just a game of rock-paper-scissors. Don't waste your time," De Bias wrote.

Personally, I already had believed in many of the ideas and ideals proposed by De Bias, but he did offer interesting explanations. "Coming of Age in Babylon, Finding Your Own Reality" is a short and easy read. The book is similar to a conversation with your friends, because of the array of subjects and slang words.

De Bias is able to convey the ideals of one stereotyped generation, the hippies, to another, Generation X. Perhaps there is hope, and maybe this world can be self-actualized. The first step toward this goal is understanding. So understand this quote from De Bias on the subject of homosexuality, which also can be applied to life, "Society will become healthier as we learn to accept the realities of human difference."

World-renowned jazz musician to play at K-State

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

Perhaps it's telling that Jon Faddis first played with Dizzy Gillespie at the young age of 15.

Faddis, who's the guest artist at Saturday's Count Basie Orchestra concert in McCain Auditorium, and Gillespie, this year's K-State Jazz Festival honoree, formed a friendship with professional results.

A native of Oakland, Calif., Faddis met Gillespie while at the Jazz Workshop in San Francisco. He sat in on Gillespie's combo.

"I didn't know that's what I'd be doing for the rest of my life," Faddis said. "It was scary. Exciting. It had all the feelings in it."

In 1987, Faddis organized a big band for Gillespie's 70th birthday celebration. He also organized Gillespie's United Nations Orchestra in 1989.

Faddis has just released a new album, "Remembrances," that is somewhat of a departure from the high-level playing with which he's made a name for himself. His new album is a lush, steamy set of ballads with strings and horns adding a rich undertone to each song — just the sort of thing you won't hear at Saturday's concert. "It's something different for me," Faddis said. "I wanted to do a softer album."

Faddis has played regularly not only with Gillespie, but with Lionel Hampton and Charles Mingus and recorded with the likes of Frank Sinatra and Clark Terry. His albums include 1986's "Take Double (w/ Clark Terry)" and 1989's "Into the Faddisphere."

Having started at age 8 after seeing Louis

Armstrong perform on "The Ed Sullivan Show," Faddis has been dedicated to his music since.

By age 18, he had joined Hampton's band as a featured soloist. He then moved to New York and spent four years with the Thad Jones/Mel Lewis Big Band at the famed Village Vanguard.

Unbelievably, this is Faddis' first turn as a soloist with the Basie band.

"Getting a chance to play with one of the great jazz bands of the world — I'm looking forward to it," Faddis said. "It has such a rich history — all the musicians who have come through it."

Faddis has played with nearly every large jazz big band and has on several occasions organized special tours, such as the Newport Jazz Festival 40th Anniversary Tour and the 1995 Lincoln Center Jazz Orchestra's The Majesty of Louis Armstrong Tour.

"There's nothing like a big band in jazz — the power that is very capably represented with the Count Basie Orchestra," Faddis said.

His K-State connection is with Dennis Wilson, director of jazz studies. Wilson plays trombone in the Faddis-directed Carnegie Hall Jazz Band, which Faddis created in 1991. Wilson is working with the Carnegie band this week, and he and Faddis won't be in Manhattan until Friday.

Faddis said running a big band is no easy task, even in New York City.

"It's really important for corporate sponsors and major arts institutions to support big bands," Faddis said. "With Count Basie, being able to travel and pay its members — that's rare."

He said the Carnegie band pulls most of its members from the New York area, although K-State's Wilson flies between the two Apples for concerts. Last Thanksgiving, the band toured Italy.

Few trumpet players are in as much demand worldwide as Faddis. The complete musician, he travels to perform as much as he does to teach. He's only recently come home to New Jersey from a stint in Europe.

When he comes to K-State this weekend, he'll not only headline Saturday's concert, but he'll be giving a master class — in full view of the public — at noon on Saturday in Union Forum Hall.

Wilson said this class is something that has gained Faddis a good reputation.

"He does a thing called history of the jazz trumpet," Wilson said. "This is one of the most phenomenal jazz clinics in the country. He'll take on all these personalities — Dizzy, Louis Armstrong — he'll sound just like these guys."

One would think the jazz community would be small, especially given that Faddis has played with about every large talent in the past 30 years.

"There are always new jazz musicians on the scene," Faddis said. "Sometimes, going to the North Sea Jazz Festival in The Hague, Netherlands, I'll see a neighbor who lives five blocks from me before I'll see them at home in New Jersey. There are rare instances like that."

Student plays come to Purple Masque

DIANA LEE
Kansas State Collegian

"Lunchbag Theatre," a series of one-act plays presented by the theater department's acting and directing workshop class, will begin its 21st season on Feb. 19.

The plays are presented at 11:30 a.m. in the Purple Masque Theatre, normally on Thursdays, although some will also be on Tuesdays because more plays will be presented than have been in the past. There is no admission charge, and those who attend are encouraged to bring a lunch, because the plays stretch over the lunch hour.

"Depending on the play, they last between 30 and 45 minutes," Lew Shelton, associate professor of speech communication, theater and dance said.

There will be 10 plays this semester, with each student actor performing in two and each student director in charge of two.

The first play this semester,

"Charlie the Chicken," a comedy about a performing chicken, will be presented on Feb. 19. The class will also present "Icarus' Mother," a one-act written by the well-known playwright Sam Shepard, on March 5.

"Desdemona, the Story of a Handkerchief," a workover of Shakespeare's "Othello," will be directed by one of the actors in "Goodnight Desdemona," also being presented this semester in Nichols Theatre.

"I encourage them to select works by well-known, established playwrights. The selection also depends on the actor breakdown. This semester, we have four men and seven women; so they obviously had to select plays with more roles for women," Shelton said.

"These plays give students a chance to see plays written by the playwrights we talk about in class. In the past, we've done plays by writers such as Tennessee Williams, Chekov and Albee," Shelton said.

Students must have permission to enroll in the workshop. They are required to have at least two courses in acting or one course in directing before taking this course.

These plays give students experience working with their peers, on an equal basis, in acting as well as directing.

"On all of our other productions in the theater department, there is a faculty member directing, so there is a student/teacher relationship. This is really the culminating learning experience for many of our students," Shelton said.

Students from the lighting design class do lighting, but there is not a heavy emphasis on production.

"There is actually no budget, so the actors put together what they can with what they have," Shelton said.

GRANT ENABLES STUDENTS TO LEARN GAME OF BOWLING AT UNION RECREATION AREA.

WYNN DALTON
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State Student Union recreation area is a new after-school hangout for some area high school and middle school students.

Thanks to an $8,000 grant issued by the Youth Empowerment for Success program, students can bowl for free after school until 5 p.m. on Monday and Wednesday afternoons.

An average of 60 middle school students bowl each Monday and 19 high school students bowl each Wednesday. The program started Jan. 19 and will continue through May 11.

Students receive free bowling and formal instruction during these hours. Transportation to and from the Union is provided by Manhattan-Ogden USD 383, and students are returned to their schools in time for parents to pick them up after work.

Students are required to sign up at their local schools and get parental permission in order to attend. Union Recreation Manager Terri Eddy said one objective of the program is for parents to know where their children are when they are not in school.

"We are a host to the campus. We're open to the community, and we wanted to help the community," Eddy said. "This gives kids something to do after school and keeps them out of trouble."

Manhattan High School sophomore Steve Kalivoda said he enjoyed this break from the norm.

"We usually just play basketball after school," he said. "This gives us a little something else to do."

K-State student workers are also involved in helping the program run smoothly.

"They're not a problem," said Nathan Killian, Union employee and junior in landscape design. "They goof off, have a good time and don't cause any problems."

The YES program is a local organization that monetarily contributes to the success of not-for-profit youth programs. In partnership with the McCormick Foundation in Chicago, YES matches funds contributed to the YES fund by local businesses and people. For each dollar donated, YES and McCormick Foundation contribute $2. Local gifts have the ability to be tripled.

"The McCormick Foundation is obviously

WE ARE A HOST TO THE CAMPUS. WE'RE OPEN TO THE COMMUNITY, AND WE WANT TO HELP THE COMMUNITY. THIS GIVES KIDS SOMETHING TO DO AFTER SCHOOL AND KEEPS THEM OUT OF TROUBLE.

TERRI EDDY
Union recreation manager

a very large foundation," said Clark Reinke, YES fund adviser and USD 383 associate Superintendent. "The purpose of the foundation is to encourage local philanthropy. They have selected to work with this community and have established an amount that is to be matched."

Reinke said a local board was set up, and key contributors and local businesses decided the focus would be youth programs.

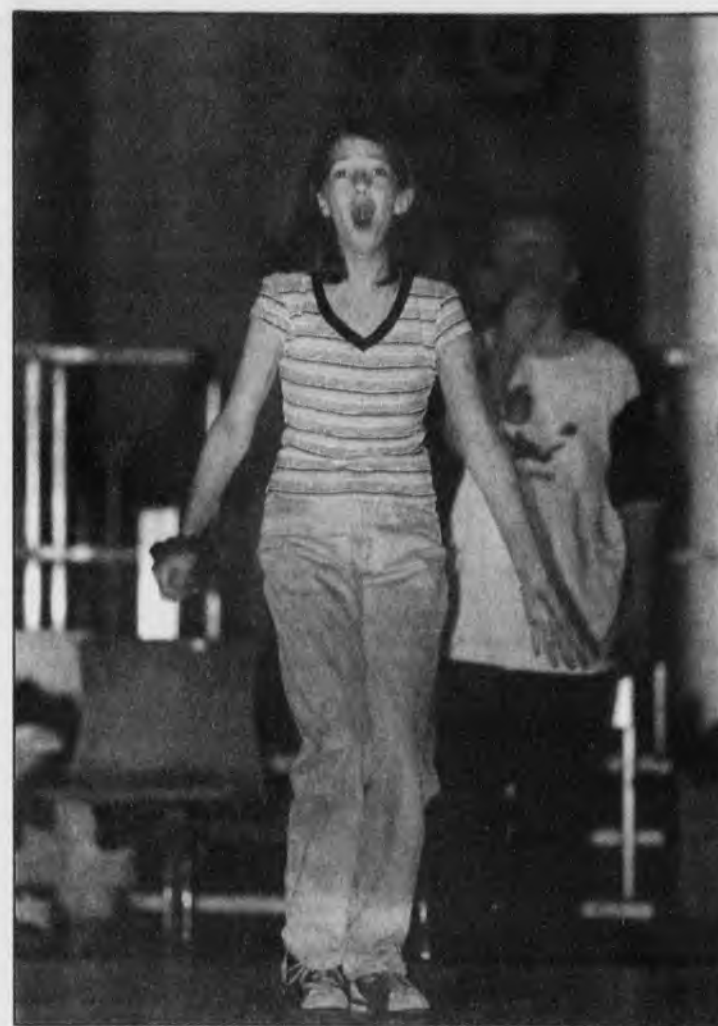

There are several criteria used when awarding funds. Reinke said programs supported by the YES fund are encouraged to partner with schools, focus on high school and middle school students, run during the summer or before or after school, and have not-for-profit status.

YES is also associated with the Department of Education and K-State education students. Students within the department are required to serve the community before entering the teacher preparation program. YES programs are one outlet for education students to fulfill their requirements.

Reinke said the connection with Manhattan schools is important to keep kids in school and to foster trust within the schools.

"This is a unique and special opportunity for the community," he said.

This year $258,000 was given to the Manhattan community through the YES program as a gift. The McCormick Foundation has supported the Manhattan community since its initial offering of flood relief in 1993.

Proper maintenance, care prevents winter salt, sand damage

SHERYL WILLIAMS
Kansas State Collegian

Sand and salt used to treat ice and snow can be detrimental to carpets and a nuisance in the streets, if proper care isn't taken.

Because of the number of ice and snow storms in Manhattan this winter, the sand has accumulated on the streets. The city has tried to eliminate the use of sand, partially to prevent it from getting into the storm sewers.

"One of the bigger adverse effects is that we have to go out and sweep it up, and that takes a lot of time and effort and resources to do that," said Chuck Williams, assistant director of Manhattan public works for transportation.

When adequate supplies of rock salt are available, sand is not used. Williams said this year, the city has had some difficulties getting salt, because it uses less salt compared with other users such as the Kansas Department of Transportation. Because of low supplies, sand has been used, mainly on side streets.

The city uses either sand or salt — the two are not mixed. Williams said the city limits the amount of salt used by adding liquid calcium chloride, a pre-wetting agent that makes the salt more effective. The calcium chloride has a corrosion inhibitor added to it, to cut down on its corrosive nature.

Williams said with the amount of salt and the method used, there is not an adverse effect on the concrete and asphalt streets.

"With the development of the concrete mixtures we use, it doesn't have the effect it used to have, where it would actually eat into the concrete," Williams said.

Ice and snow treatments can also have an adverse effect on flooring, said a spokesman for Shaw Industries, a leading producer of carpeting, based in Dalton, Ga.

"Sand and salt is probably the biggest problem carpet has," said Jay Wright, group leader for physical services. "It is tracked onto the carpet and ground into the fiber as it is walked on, which makes it look dull and dingy."

Most carpet fibers today are plastic and are scratched by sand, salt and dirt, which wears the carpet out more quickly. Vinyl and wooden floors are also susceptible to scratches from these particles. Wright suggests removing your shoes when you enter the house.

A local designer said the type of shoes worn in a house also make a difference.

"Tennis shoes are continually dropping off grit and dirt, more so than a dress shoe, because they keep dirt up in those little grooves," Claudia Jones, interior designer at Crown Decorating, said.

The salt residue should be rinsed off of your vehicle as soon as possible, according to a local body shop.

"Left on there any length of time, it can tend to leave stains," said Ty McCullough, manager at Alan Clark Body Shop.

McCullough said if there is bare metal from chips or dings, the residue can speed up the rusting process.

Board members hope to fix bylaws

nearly a decade before Simon took over. Oukrop said she probably didn't know the bylaws as well as she could have, but said she didn't think it should matter that much.

To her knowledge, a dispute had never resulted in a director being removed, she said.

"It worked just fine for 106 years," she said.

The board, in its role as publisher of the Collegian, Royal Purple yearbook and the Campus Directory, is ultimately responsible for them, Oukrop said.

Traditionally, the responsibility has involved hiring the editors in chief of the newspaper and the yearbook, and the advertising manager, she said. Oukrop said the board also decides salaries and has worked hard over the years to write a solid policy statement.

Kevin Klassen, Collegian representative on the board, said making the board stronger is something all members agree upon.

"What that would mean," he said, "is that the board would have to take it upon themselves to find out about the organizations."

That's been a problem for a long time, he said. As fall 1996 Collegian editor, he offered to let board members witness regular production nights at the newsroom.

"I couldn't even get them to do that," he said.

Simon said he is also in favor of a strong board. He said a standing committee for policy review might be in order to look at the bylaws.

That committee could determine what powers the board will keep and which it will delegate to employees such as the director.

"Strong boards protect student rights most of the time," he said.

Carlton Getz, at-large member of the board, said the board members who voted to remove Johnson last week were most concerned with their powers as board members to hire a director they considered competent to represent them.

Johnson's contract is with the College of Arts and Sciences, which pays half of Johnson's total salary for his work as an instructor of journalism.

The other $33,249, paid by Student Publications, was one reason Getz voted to remove Johnson, he said. Student Publications has no contractual control over Johnson or the director portion of his salary.

An incident in September, where Johnson lost his temper in a meeting with the Privilege Fee Committee, was another reason, Getz said.

"Really, what it comes down to is the determination of the board to exercise its responsibilities," he said.

Getz said those responsibilities include hiring a director who can represent the board. He agreed that the bylaws don't offer much guidance, and require more details in regard to the board's power.

"That's something we're going to have to work on," he said. "Hopefully, we'll have it together by the end of the year."

Simon said he wished the members who had problems with the relationship between the school and Student Publications or with Johnson's performance had brought them forward before Wednesday's meeting.

He has scheduled another meeting for Sunday.

"I don't know why they feel this way," he said.

"It's confusing. I've been thinking about this for almost a week and I'm still confused. It's a pretty good sign that we ought to talk about it."

Zoo employees use innovative feeding methods

ioral enrichment. Rather than setting a tub in front of the animals to eat, zoo keepers hide the food around the cage.

Smith said she puts condiments in chimpanzee food, like mustard and jelly, to keep them stimulated and interested in the food.

When it comes to actually feeding the animals, things can get a little scary, zoo keeper Brian Davoren said.

"Occasionally, if you're not careful, the chimps will try to grab you," he said. "Our only protection is an eight-foot pole. I have only seen it used twice."

The cheetahs can also be scary, he said.

Shoemaker said the one thing he tells children who want to be zoo keepers is that a college education is crucial. Zoo keepers now have to know about nutrition, reproduction and animal behavior, he said.

"Zoo keepers don't just put food out and clean up manure," Shoemaker said.

Restructured regents' system to include Washburn University as state school

stituencies of the schools.

After receiving public input, Adkins said, the committee will finish details of the plan and prepare a final report to be given to legislators when the proposal is ready for introduction in bill form.

Rep. Mike Farmer, R-Wichita, chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on regents institutions budgets, said his panel would use the select committee's funding plan as the basis for hearings on university budgets for fiscal year 1999.

Members of the new Council on Higher Education would be appointed by the governor and confirmed by the Senate.

The present regents would nominate at least 10 people from which the governor would fill five of the seats; the State Board of Education and Community College Association would nominate at least four people to fill two seats each, and Washburn's Board of Regents and the Area Vocational Technical School Association would nominate at least two people for one seat each.

According to the plan, an Educational Coordinating Commission also would be created to serve as a liaison board between the new council and the State Board of Education.

As an incentive to support the plan, community college property tax mill levies are capped at 15 mills, and those that have mill levies of less than 15 would get extra money as an enticement. That is aimed primarily at attracting the support of Johnson County Community College and its constituents.

Also, Washburn's present 15-mill levy on Topeka property taxpayers would be eliminated within two fiscal years, but a three-mill levy for capital improvements would remain.

The funding plan was front-loaded so the property-tax relief in the community college districts and in Topeka comes in the first two fiscal years — 1999 and 2000.

The plan puts in $32.4 million for property-tax relief in fiscal 1999 and another $17.5 million in fiscal 2000.

It also adds $30 million over those two fiscal years for university and community-college enhancements in the areas of program improvement, faculty salaries and purchasing technology equipment.

Another $50 million for enhancements is included in fiscal 2001 and 2002.

Total cost of the financial plan over four years is $137.9 million, of which $57.9 million is for property-tax relief and $80 million for enhancements.

In his dreadlocks and wire-rimmed glasses, Byron defies bland swing-era stereotypes before he even plays a note. His musical interests range from Stravinsky to Motown.

In addition to the first musical set, Byron and his friends will perform a remarkable score he created to Scar of Shame. This 1920s silent classic once labeled a "race movie," focuses on the life of urban blacks in the 1920s.

"Byron plays with almost alarming command. If he carries anything from his klezmer work, it is his ability to make the clarinet cry, laugh, lecture and mourn as if it were human..."

Carmike owns three theaters in Manhattan — Campus Theatre, Westloop 6 Theatres and Seth Childs 6 Theatre. The company now offers tickets for students and military personnel at a discounted price of $5 for all non-matinee shows. Ticket prices for matinees will remain at $4. Regular-priced tickets are still $5.75. In contrast, student ticket prices at some

Kansas City theaters range from $3.50 to $3.75, while non-student prices are consistent with those in Manhattan, ranging from $5.50 to $6.

Carmike Cinemas claims to be the "largest motion-picture exhibitor in the United States," operating 519 theaters and 2,518 screens around the country. The area theaters are the only ones the group operates in Kansas.

Bob Howard, city manager for Carmike, said there was a student-priced ticket before the national company took over operation of the cinemas.

"We've done that before, but when Carmikes took over and brought in their computer system, it did not have a student discount written in its program," Howard said. "Once we debugged the system and got permission from the higher-ups, we reintroduced the student pricing."

Though Carmike Cinemas owns all of Manhattan's off-campus movie venues, Howard said they are not holding the community hostage with high ticket prices.

"With this small market, competition will actually drive ticket prices up," he said. "We would have to raise ticket prices to lure the bigger motion pictures to Manhattan."

He said distributors look at the profit potential, and then decide which theaters get their movies. If Carmike had to compete with another theater, it would have to raise prices to show better films, he said.

"Another theater would really put a strain on the turnstiles in Manhattan," Howard said.

Donato Lipari, junior in mechanical engineering, said a student ticket discount wouldn't make that big a difference for students.

"Most people that I know would rather spend their money on other entertainment outlets," Lipari said. "One dollar might make a difference for some students, but unless there is a movie that I really want to see, I'm going to save my money."

But Chris Harlow, sophomore in interior architecture, said he welcomes the change.

"I look to save a buck anywhere possible," Harlow said. "If I take a date, there's money that I've saved. That all adds up."

Manhattan's only other cinema entertainment appears in the K-State Student Union. Union Program Council regularly shows feature and independent films in Union Forum Hall. Tickets are $1 for the feature films and $1.75 for the art films.

"There are no student-priced tickets for UPC films," said Chris Heeley, UPC Kaleidoscope Film committee member. "It's one price for all those who want to come and enjoy the films."

Alumni show support for dismissed director through e-mail, letters

JENNIFER LUCKE
Kansas State Collegian

The Board of Student Publications' decision last week to declare Ron Johnson's position as director vacant prompted a flood of feedback, both positive and negative, from K-State alumni.

Todd Simon, chairman of the board and director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications, said he received more than 200 e-mail messages concerning Johnson. He also said there have been numerous phone calls and letters as well.

Simon said the feedback he received is overwhelmingly in support of Johnson. He said this is a result of the type of people he comes into contact with as director of the journalism school.

"I'm not going to get a normal sample of people. I'm going to hear from alumni and students more than anything else. It shouldn't be surprising that only three were in support of the board's decision," Simon said.

Johnson said he has also received nearly 250 e-mails from alumni and colleagues across the country.

He said he has heard from reporters at The Associated Press, USA Today and other newspapers across the country. Former students in education and public relations have also contacted him, he said.

Company genetically alters nicotine levels in tobacco products

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — A large American tobacco company is selling cigarettes made with genetically altered, high-nicotine tobacco despite assurances to the government it had stopped the practice four years ago.

The genetically altered tobacco packs twice the nicotine of natural leaf. The secret use of the ingredient was disclosed by Roger Black, director of leaf blending for Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., in a Jan. 16 deposition for New York state's class-action suit against the large tobacco companies.

The deposition was conducted in private, and the transcript was ordered sealed by a state Supreme Court judge. However, a letter summarizing the testimony was found by The Associated Press in a public court file.

Tuesday afternoon, Brown & Williamson issued a statement acknowledging that genetically altered, high-nicotine tobacco was being used "in small amounts in certain brands, like Raleigh, Richland, Prime and Summit."

The use of the genetically altered tobacco doesn't mean Americans are smoking cigarettes with higher nicotine levels.

Instead, Brown & Williamson said it uses the ingredient to control nicotine content. By blending nicotine-enhanced leaf with weaker tobaccos, it produces a variety of brands with varying nicotine levels to satisfy smokers' differing tastes.

Nevertheless, the disclosure could prove a significant development in state lawsuits against cigarette companies and in the U.S. Food and Drug Administration's drive to regulate the industry on grounds that cigarettes deliver an addictive drug. Critics will see it as more evidence the company manipulates dosages of nicotine, the addictive chemical in tobacco, in order to "hook" smokers.

Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., told of the Black deposition by the AP, said the deposition was "the most compelling case to date to force our government to stop sitting on its hands when there's proven evidence that a company is manipulating cigarettes in a way that will poison youngsters."

This is not the first time Brown & Williamson has been found to be adding genetically altered tobacco to its cigarettes.

In 1994, the FDA learned the company had spent more than a decade developing a nicotine-rich plant. Code-named Y-1, the plant is the product of state-of-the-art breeding techniques, including processes known as protoplast fusion and hybrid sorting.

ABDULHAQQ, ALONG WITH THREE OTHER BLACK MANHATTAN ENTREPRENEURS TALKED ABOUT HOW TO START A SMALL BUSINESS.

Entrepreneurs offer tips to ambitious K-State students

Panelists answered questions and offered advice Tuesday night to students and community members interested in starting their own businesses.

The "African-Americans in Entrepreneurship: An Empowered Journey Traveled by Many" workshop was part of Black History Month. The panelists, all from Manhattan, own businesses in pest control, cosmetology, entertainment and children's programs.

The panelists had different reasons for starting their own businesses. Linda Battle, owner of Turning Heads Beauty Salon, said she was ready to work for herself.

"After 10 hard, long years, I got tired of working for someone else and decided I could make my own business work," Battle said.

Jawwad Abdulhaqq, senior in political science and owner of N2 Soul Entertainment, said he started his business for the challenge.

"I just love to be able to build something, and starting this business gave me that opportunity," he said.

The panel addressed business planning as the key to a successful start as an entrepreneur. Most of the entrepreneurs used resources such as the Small Business Association to help them get started.

"We got the business plan done through the Small Business Association, and it's served as the blueprint through all of our planning and operation," Abdulhaqq said.

Another panelist, Wallace Kidd, owner of Anti-Pest Co., said his planning started at K-State.

"My planning and preparation started here at K-State by taking classes in entomology and parasitology," Kidd said. "With an education, you can go as far as you want to in the field."

Kidd is a 1950 K-State graduate, and his business will celebrate its 50th year this summer.

When asked about financing a new business, the panelists offered suggestions on acquiring loans and using their own money.

"It just so happens, in my case anyway, that the shop paid for itself and everything came from my pocket," Battle said. "But I would probably do things differently if I were to do it over again."

Kidd said, "When applying for a loan, make sure you take out a big enough amount to start off with. It is sometimes easy to forget to figure in things like taxes."

Along with financial advice for beginners, the panelists said they are always looking for ways to expand their businesses.

"You must be able to multiply yourself many times if you want to grow, so you must find someone you can trust to work with. Then you can grow," Kidd said.

All the panelists' businesses are based in Manhattan. Panelist Richard Pitts said Manhattan has been a good place for the Wonder Workshop Children's Museum.

"Manhattan is a good place for us. We must continue to be unique to Manhattan, though, to stay successful as a children's museum," Pitts said.

Wichita middle school employees charged with selling cocaine, but not to students

WICHITA — A math teacher, a teacher's aide and a night-shift custodian at Jardine-Edison Middle School face federal cocaine charges and have been suspended with pay. Terrance D. Vick, the teacher, was arrested Friday after a grand jury indicted him on two federal drug trafficking felonies. He is charged with selling 27 grams of crack cocaine and possessing 28 grams of cocaine powder with the intent to sell, both in July. He has a bond hearing in federal court Wednesday.

Sources told The Wichita Eagle that Vick was not accused of selling drugs to students. All three worked at Jardine-Edison Middle School.

In a separate case, Vick's co-workers, paraprofessional Anthony W. Criner and custodian Doris J. White were indicted last month in Laredo, Texas, with conspiring to sell at least five kilograms more than 10 pounds of cocaine, the Eagle reported.

School Board President Jean Schodorf said she is disappointed and angry that federal marshals had not notified the district immediately about the arrests.

Linda Williams, who has a son and daughter at Jardine, said her children took the news of Vick's arrest "really hard because he's a really good teacher."

Dillons delays contract signing, provides chance for Teamsters to analyze finances

HUTCHINSON, Kan. — Dillon Stores has delayed signing a contract with Dallas-based Transport Industries Inc. to give truck drivers represented by the Teamsters Union a chance to make a counterproposal.

The Hutchinson-based grocery store chain had scheduled a decision on the contract with TI for Tuesday. But the union had asked that the decision be delayed until union representatives in Washington, D.C. could analyze the financial information provided by Dillons.

Dillons spokesman Dennis Gaschler said Tuesday morning that Dillons would delay the final decision on the contract for a few days.

On Monday, Dillon Stores filed an unfair labor practice complaint with the National Labor Relations Board against the union for allegedly refusing to negotiate. The union had previously filed such a complaint against the state's largest grocery store chain.

A spokesman for the union was not available for comment Tuesday morning.

Dillon Stores announced Jan. 27 that it planned to contract its transportation services, giving employees a chance to buy Dillons trucks and become independent operators with TI. But the union has fought that decision, saying it would leave employees without company-provided benefits.

The unfair labor complaint alleges that the union "has refused to negotiate with Dillons regarding the transportation unit, and has ignored Dillons' repeated requests to return to the bargaining table."

New surgeon general fills vacant position; elected despite divided conservative vote

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Dr. David Satcher, who rose from an impoverished childhood in rural Alabama to lead the Centers for Disease Control, overcame conservative objections to win confirmation as surgeon general Tuesday.

He fills a high-profile but politically risky job that has been vacant for more than three years as President Clinton searched for someone who could speak with authority on public health and also win Senate approval.

"This is an American dream come true," Satcher, 56, said in a statement, "to go from a humble farm in Anniston, Alabama, to the office of surgeon general, to have the chance to serve the country I love, and to earn the confidence of so many leaders I honor and respect."

Satcher was approved on a 63-35 vote despite arguments by some conservatives that his positions on abortion and other issues rendered him unfit. All the Democrats voted for Satcher, but Republicans were divided, with 19 voting for the nomination and 35 against.

Clinton did not directly acknowledge the criticism but called Satcher "a mainstream physician who is an eloquent advocate for the health of all Americans."

Dow Jones average rises to highest point in 6 months, might signal bull market end

NEW YORK — The Dow Jones industrial average set its first record high in six months Tuesday, culminating a comeback from its worst one-day point loss in history.

Wall Street's best-known indicator rose 115.09 to 8,295.61, topping its all-time best close of 8,259.31. That mark was set back on Aug. 6, one day before the stock market began a steep slide amid the first whiffs of Asia's mounting financial troubles.

Broad-market indicators also rose sharply on Tuesday, with the Standard & Poor's 500 index, the mostly widely followed benchmark for mutual funds, closing at a record high for the sixth time in nine sessions.

Tuesday's record by the Dow follows a discouraging half-year that's seen recovery after recovery fizzle, prompting fears that the most resilient bull market in history had finally run out of steam.

In the past two weeks investors have shown more gumption thanks to recent signs of strength in the U.S. economy and company profits, not to mention a lack of worrisome developments among Wall Street's leading concerns: the economic crisis in Asia, the Monica Lewinsky scandal and a potential military clash with Iraq.

"Very little is panicking them. People really don't seem to care about Clinton and are staying calm about everything else," James Glynn, a broker with Greer and Associates, said outside the New York Stock Exchange after Tuesday's close.

Dean teaches to link interests of students, administrators in classroom

JOSHUA STURGILL
Kansas State Collegian

Through teaching, a dean of arts and sciences continues to maintain ties between students and administration.

Despite a busy schedule, Stephen White teaches Geography of the U.S. at 8:30 Monday, Wednesday and Friday mornings.

"Let's go ahead and get started," calls White over the murmur of his students.

White opened class Monday by reviewing U.S. immigration policies for a future exam.

White has a simple explanation for why he has chosen to remain in the classroom.

"I really enjoy teaching," he said. "It's a part of me."

White, who has been teaching at K-State for 22 years, was appointed associate dean last October.

Though his responsibilities as dean are much different than a professor's, White said he plans to continue teaching at least every other semester.

"There are 20,000 students at K-State, and we're here to serve them," he said.

Maintaining contact with students is important, and it makes better administrators, he added.

"If I were a student today actively concerned about the university, I would be glad the administration is in the classroom," White said.

Jamie Wetig, junior in secondary education and a student of White's, said she agreed.

"It's important for deans to get a good sense of what the classroom is like," Wetig said. "He'll know what type of on-campus improvements need to be made, and how students are today."

White graduated with a doctorate in geography from the University of Kentucky. He said teaching keeps him in touch with his academic tradition.

"Reading and teaching in geography helps me be in contact with my discipline," he said.

White said this academic pursuit began in childhood.

"I loved to look at maps as a child," he said.

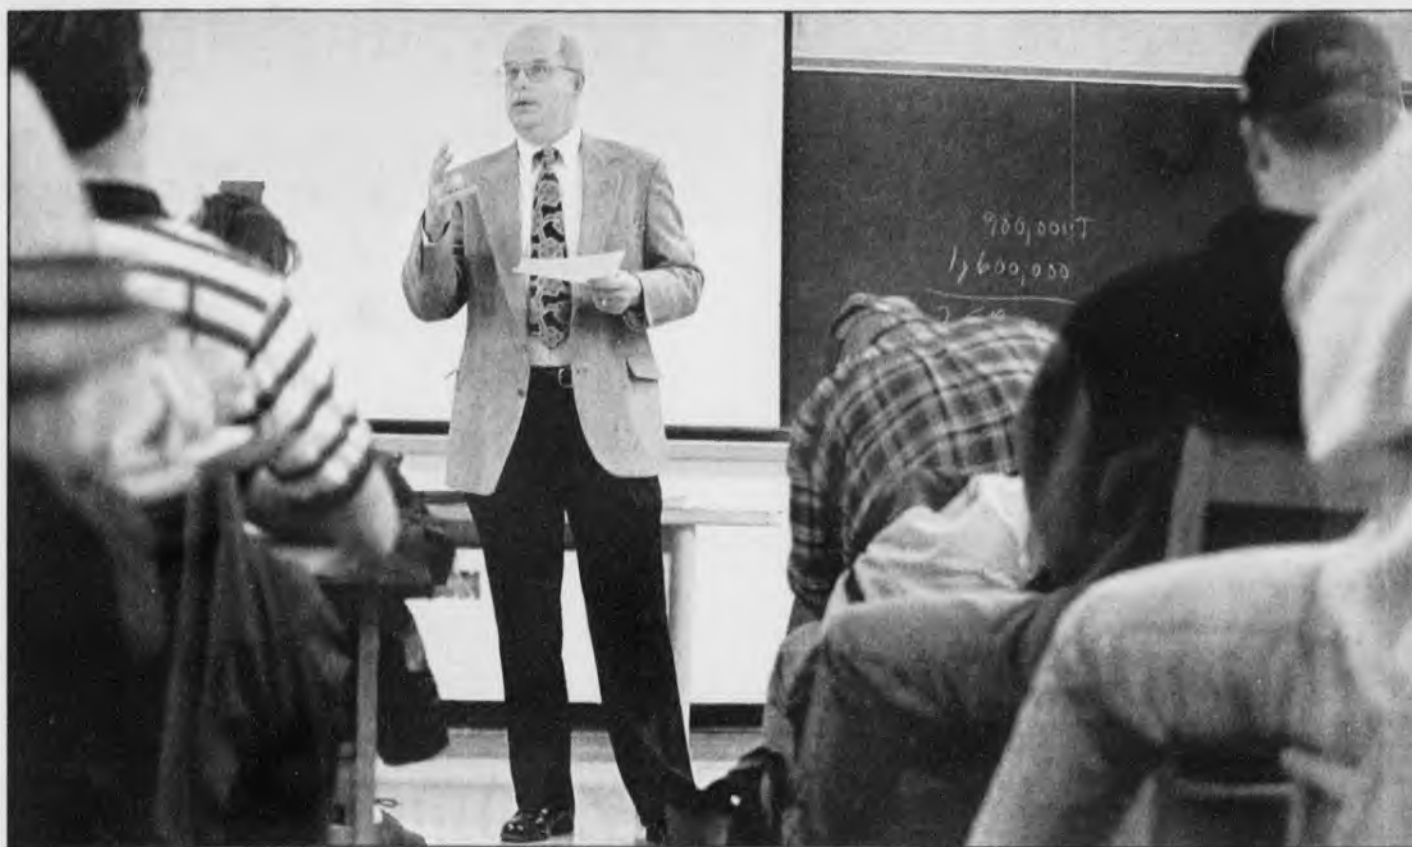

White said he enjoyed geography and the related field of history in high school, and later decided to turn his affinity into a degree at the University of Kentucky.

After graduation, while looking for teaching opportunities, White began working for the Kentucky State Planning Office.

"I worked on statewide transport planning, travel models, and urban/community planning," he said.

After a year with the State Planning Office, White decided to accept an appointment at K-State. He said K-State was one of his top choices.

"I was looking for a good geography program with a master's level, so I could research and teach," he said. "K-State seemed to be very dedicated to this."

White's students said they appreciate his experience.

"He's one of the best because he's gotten that far. He's a good teacher, and it's a privilege to be in his class," Kristen Klimstra, senior in geography, said.

Most importantly, White said he believes that teaching keeps his priorities in focus.

"Faculty decisions affect students," White said. "Teaching puts students in the forefront of our priorities."

House leader supports education restructuring plan; Senate seems skeptical of funding

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Like a proud father, Speaker Tim Shallenburger Tuesday embraced a plan for restructuring governance of higher education in Kansas that was delivered to him — on time and on budget — by a special committee he created.

The plan, developed by the House Select Committee on Higher Education, was on representatives' desks on the day Shallenburger set as a deadline, and its cost was within what he considers reasonable.

"I know it costs money, but it's now become our job as leadership to sell it," said Shallenburger, R-Baxter Springs. "I don't have any concerns about it passing the House."

The four-year plan would cost the state about $137 million in new appropriations for post-secondary education in the next four fiscal years, a cost Shallenburger said would be well worth it if the plan improves coordination and leads to consolidation of schools.

Asked where he would find the money to pay for the plan, Shallenburger said, "You don't find money. You reappropriate. If it's important, we'll do it. The House will bite the bullet."

Reaction in the Senate was more skeptical.

"I think it's going to be very difficult to pass a comprehensive higher education overhaul plan in the 1998 election year," said Senate President Dick Bond, R-Overland Park.

"I suppose the largest criticism I have of this plan is that its emphasis is on property tax relief for communities that have community colleges more than it is on higher education reform."

Reaction was not all positive in the House, either.

Rep. Cindy Empson, R-Independence, chairwoman of an interim committee that addressed community college funding last year, was among the more skeptical House members.

Rep. Ed McKechnie, D-Pittsburg, who developed the funding portion of the select committee's plan, tried to sell Empson on the increased spending.

"Darling, it's a good plan," she told McKechnie. "But you're buying everyone off."

The plan would make Washburn University a full state university by July 1, 2000, and includes the largest increase in new funding for higher education in state history — $50 million to reduce community college and Washburn property tax mill levies and $87 million to enhance programs, raise faculty salaries and purchase new technology equipment.

The financial enhancements are aimed at gaining support from higher education constituencies.

"The committee that presented this report represents a very diverse group of legislators," said Rep. David Adkins, R-Leawood, chairman of the select committee.

"For them to be able to reach consensus, not only on a governance plan but also a funding plan, is unprecedented in recent history."

"Previous studies have been unable to put together a package that addresses what this report addresses. It is a package of important enhancements for higher education."

"We are looking forward to working with communities that will be impacted, and learning their reaction to it."

The committee scheduled meetings in 15 university and community college cities Thursday through Monday to explain the plan and solicit responses. Members of the public are welcome at the meetings, Adkins said.

If voters approve a constitutional amendment at the August primary election, the present nine-member Kansas Board of Regents would be replaced with an 11-member Council of Higher Education that would have governance authority over seven state universities — adding Washburn — and would have coordinating authority over the two-year community colleges and vocational-technical schools.

The present State Board of Education would continue to run kindergarten-through-12th grade education.

Reinstatement of movie discount long overdue

Students cried out and Carmike Cinemas listened. Management at Manhattan's Carmike Cinemas are reinstating the discounted ticket price of $5 for students and military personnel at all non-matinee shows. This is, after all, a college town and the contributions of Fort Riley military personnel cannot be overlooked. Thanks for listening. Now, there are a few other things you might consider. While the rationale of showing blockbusters on multiple screens is sound, there is no reason for one movie to tie up two screens for weeks on end.

Student schedules, by definition, are extremely flexible and with classes and on-campus jobs filling most of the day, there would be a market for matinees on Friday afternoons and movies that start after 8 p.m. on week nights. Try some late movies, you might be surprised who shows up. Students with young children would benefit from fewer R-rated movies, especially at the matinee and early evening shows. Don't forget that ushers perform an important task at theaters — to keep noise levels and behavior under control.

Perhaps another theater, a multiplex on the east side of town, would put the Manhattan movie-going audience into perspective. We might be a captive market, but we are a market. In a town without too many entertainment opportunities, some healthy competition might help. What happened to art movies? When Varsity Theatre closed its doors, there was hope art movies might begin showing elsewhere. Critically acclaimed, cutting-edge movies make their bread and butter with student audiences. Yes, Varsity stumbled and fell — but blame it at least in part on poor ventilation, weird hours and minimal advertisement. A real art theater deserves a fighting chance. The Kaleidoscope Film Committee contributes to movie diversity with foreign movie selections and occasionally brings in interesting classics, but it does little to bring in relevant and recently released art films. Thanks for reinstating student discounts. Perhaps these other suggestions could be addressed. Movies are a main source of entertainment in Manhattan and Carmike Cinemas can do an even better job of serving students.

GRAMMYS, SHMAMMYS

With lack of quality nominees, this year's show would be better off canceled

Wednesday evening, Feb. 25. Just another date, right? Wrong. This is the night the American public, via national television, will find out who gets to take home those coveted pieces of music memorabilia called the Grammys.

The Grammys have never meant much to me because of those stupid little music categories such as Alternative, Rock, Hard Rock and so on. Half the time, the categories aren't indicative of the styles of music they contain. It's beyond me how the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences can lump a bunch of unrelated songs together and then pick the best one. After all, isn't that just the academy's opinion?

Let's start with one of this year's funnier categories: Best Rock Song.

In this four-contender category we have "Bitch" by Meredith Brooks, "Crash Into Me" by Dave Matthews Band, and "The Difference" and "One Headlight" by the Wallflowers. This category should be called: Weakest Excuse for a Rock Song.

First of all, I forgot about Meredith Brooks about five seconds after I heard "Bitch" for the first time. I mean, let's get real. It's catchy, it's poppy and the word "bitch" is the title. That's about it. Then there's the Dave Matthews Band which, although its members have tons of talent, is in the wrong category. I thought this was Best Rock Song. "Crash Into Me" is more of a lovey-dovey ballad than anything else. Sorry Dave, it just doesn't rock.

Now some of you might be saying, "Well, how about the Wallflowers?" All I have to say is, "Well, how about a frontal lobotomy?"

In my mind, the Wallflowers are like the plague. I avoid all their songs. Maybe it's because I'm sick of hearing about Jakob's bloodline or seeing that tortured look on his face in every video. He's not his daddy, and his songs prove it. Maybe it's because the Wallflowers' style is completely boring. Maybe it's because I've heard those two songs on the radio at least a zillion times.

Let's all get one thing straight right now. Just because MTV and every top-40 radio station in America plays them, that doesn't mean they're good. That just means they're popular, and popularity is a double-edged sword. Tons of bands strive to achieve it, and many are then ruined by it. Here today, gone today, thanks to airplay overkill. This is where I think the Wallflowers fit in. However, if there were a category that I think those two songs could win, it would be Song Most Likely to Make Me Vomit. So what's my prediction for the Best Rock Song category? Complete damnation.

Now let's move to a personal favorite of mine: Best Rap Album.

The artists vying for this award include Puffy and the Family, Missy "Misdemeanor" Elliott, Wu-Tang Clan, Wyclef and the Notorious B.I.G.

I have mixed emotions about this category, so I'll focus on whom I don't want to win. I'd eliminate Wu-Tang right off the bat. Not because I hate their album, but because the group is just too big. Sure, there's strength in numbers, but there's also more room for weak-ass rhymes. I can't even sit through some of these songs because one member is guaranteed to drop the ball. In fact, I feel sorry for some of the more skilled members such as Method Man, whose tight delivery and fluent verbal stylings are forced into the same song with lines full of rhythmic incoherency and straight-up nonsense. No Grammy for the army.

As for Puffy, I'm just so sick of him I can hardly stand it. I think it was when he destroyed "Every Breath You Take" by the Police that my liking for Puffy started to dwindle. I'll give him this though — the man knows what sells. He ganked jams from the '80s, brought down the vocals, added a little kick drum, laid down his own words, gave us some colorful videos to look at and then laughed all the way to the bank when everybody ate it up.

Like him or not, you gotta respect him for being a businessman. Nevertheless, it would be a crime against originality if he walked with the Grammy. I'll leave it up to Missy, Biggy and Wyclef to battle it out for the prize. Although all three of their albums are tight, their styles differ greatly. Tough call, but I'd have to go with Wyclef. He's just so damn smooth.

How about my personal favorites?

I'd be ecstatic if Rage Against the Machine or Foo Fighters won the Best Hard Rock Performance category. They're both up against Nine Inch Nails, Smashing Pumpkins and Bush. If Bush wins, I'll scream.

Jamiroquai really needs to win Best Pop Album for "Traveling Without Moving" so the members can say all their efforts haven't been in vain. Why their first two albums, "Emergency on Planet Earth" and "Return of the Space Cowboy" weren't an issue is a mystery to me. They are just as good as, maybe even better than, this one. In any case, they're up against Sarah McLachlin, Paula Cole, Fleetwood Mac and James Taylor. How Jamiroquai got shoved into this category is yet another mystery.

Well, there's a quick look at my take on the Grammys. I didn't cover every category, just the ones that caught my eye. The biggest thing to remember during award time is that the Grammys, much like this entire column, mean nothing. They're both just opinions.

Only the artist and the artist's fans really know who should win. Those are really the only two pieces of the puzzle that matter. The artist plays songs to make a living, and the fan buys them. When our society or the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences constantly lumps music together and collectively tags it, then awards it, the whole purpose is lost.

Music is what artists feel and how they put those feelings into song, not how society thinks those feelings should be categorized. In short, let's forget about the labels, genres and categories the system loves to use. Let's forget about the meaningless awards and the space in the charts. Let's leave music alone.

Jury still undecided on architectural modernism

Philip Johnson is dead.

Some day, that will be the headline on Page 1 in respectable newspapers throughout the country. And with that headline will come a veritable avalanche of commentary assessing the pivotal role the architect-creator played in the creation of the 20th-century modern movement.

I say this because Kenneth Frampton, who more or less wrote the foremost history book on modernism, is speaking at 5:30 tonight in Forum Hall. Frampton's book, "Modern Architecture: A Critical History," is perhaps the student's best resource for beginning to understand modernism — you'll find no meaty history in a Collegian column, folks, so look elsewhere.

But one doesn't need to wait for Johnson's death to attempt to understand modernism, since we all know or will demand of ourselves to read what will be said anyway. Johnson established modernism's presence (at least with New Yorkers) in a ground-breaking 1932 Museum of Modern Art show, "The International Style," also organized by Henry Russell Hitchcock. The show featured a star-studded line-up of masters: Le Corbusier, Ludwig Mies van der Rohe, et al.

It showed modernism to be a movement of vision, concerned with ideal communities, social housing, monumentality, introducing new technology and re-fusing architecture with an honest classicism. Well, for the sake of brevity, we'll just say this is true.

Johnson then went on to practice architecture himself, being partly responsible for the modern landmark Seagram's building in New York and wholly responsible for the infamous postmodern Chippendale high-boy AT&T building, also in New York. Closer to home, Johnson designed the Joslyn Museum of Art at the University of Nebraska.

The benefits of knowing Johnson's story are that its elements closely parallel the dilemmas suffered by modern architects and modernism itself. Instead of sticking with what he knew, or at least understood from copying others, Johnson joined a rag-tag bunch of kids in the 1960s who were bent on revolting against modernism.

One irony of this intellectual revolt is that the revolt itself is completely modern: the idea of revolting against the establishment became en vogue in the 19th century.

Anyway, the kids needed their war. In modern times, movements begin as responses to, or inspirations from, previous movements. By the 1960s, modernism had almost gasped its last. The culmination of the stark International Style that had evolved from a sincere response to modern social and technological realities, had turned into something as barren as Oscar Niemeyer's master plan for the capital city of Brasilia. Upside down and right-side-up saucers do not express meaning.

So these revolting kids begat postmodernism, which is best referred to as second modernism. It doesn't depart from modernism's basics for the most part, but applies a thin and pathetic surface of historicist detail in the name of complexity. Strangely, just as modernism faded and second modernism became the bee's knees, Johnson jumped ship and joined Robert Venturi and his gang of symbol fiends and proclaimed modernism dead.

The mistake often made by crazy kids starting new styles is to proclaim to the world the enormous potential and goals of their styles before actually delivering. The Italian futurist painters did this in the first half of this century and the postmodernists are doing it again with buildings like the AT&T.

So, just as postmodernism is waning (a mere 30 years later), critics everywhere are realizing that modernism never died. It just changed pants.

Johnson jumped ship again, if you can believe it, and aligned himself with the short-lived deconstructivist movement in the 1980s. He even organized another MoMA show in 1988, which hadn't the influence his 1932 show had maintained.

Although this deconstructivist movement launched the individualist careers of such greats as Frank Gehry (of Guggenheim Bilbao fame) and Rem Koolhaas, it passed from prominence and gave way to the confusion we call contemporary architecture. When critics are confused about what's happening, as such is the case now, we just call that the "pluralist" style. We must keep our styles in order.

Yet, Johnson is still not dead. He's not even reported to be sick. And like modernism, he has survived attacks, ridicule, horrible buildings and enough undeserved ass-kissing to last anyone two lifetimes. The quintessential 20th-century master architect.

In a town where it is truly difficult, if not impossible, to enjoy modernism — Blumont Hall is still considered Manhattan's characteristic foray into bad, bad modernism — Frampton's lecture promises the opportunity to see past recent history and appreciate buildings without letting personalities and politics interfere.

Vote to oust adviser questioned by peer

Editor,

Ron Johnson is the best college newspaper adviser in the nation.

You want proof? Check out the newspaper. It's one of the best in the nation. Check out the newspaper's awards. They're too numerous to mention, so I'll just mention the top awards in the nation — the Pacemakers and Gold Crowns. Check out the offices he's had in professional organizations. It's a who's who of presidential and vice presidential posts. Check out the hundreds of media advisers he has mentored. Check out the thousands of students he has inspired.

And the Board of Student Publications wants to fire him? I question the board's motives. I know what the board said about the contracts. But we all know that's not the reason Johnson's post was vacated. It was vacated because the student government doesn't like the Collegian's coverage, and some administrators want Johnson to review Collegian copy before it is published.

Those two disagreements are nothing new and are nothing extraordinary. Those two disagreements occur at many colleges and universities. How the board handled the situation, however, is extraordinary.

As College Media Advisers president, a post Johnson had two years ago, I urge the board and interested parties to sit down, discuss the disagreements and come to a resolution. This is merely a personnel management problem. It should be resolved in an appropriate manner.

The further education of journalists is too important to be sidetracked by these kinds of disagreements. And K-State is one of the best at educating future journalists. And Johnson is one of the best at what he does. Please let him do his job.

Biochemistry student ponders evolution

Editor,

Brandon Carlson has completely missed the point of Jason Rucker's Feb. 3 column. I don't feel Rucker was trying to say that creationism is wrong. He was merely offering another way to view the issue.

While I don't necessarily agree with Rucker's reasoning 100 percent, I felt that the column was put together rationally and with nonjudgmental intentions.

What intrigues me is that Carlson seems to be completely close-minded toward the issue and lessens his credibility in doing so. Saying that Darwinism as a whole is an unproven theory is silly. Why are humans now faced with antibiotic-resistant bacteria? Simply put, nature found a way (to quote "Jurassic Park") and organisms evolved.

Speaking as a student of biochemistry, I am personally not ready to commit to a belief that biological chemicals came together one day and decided to form a self-replicating microbe — a microbe capable of chemical reactions we can't even mimic in a test tube. However, the belief that no evolutionary processes have occurred is unreasonable. The newspaper is not large enough to include all of the evidence that supports it.

Carlson, ironically a non-scientist, seems to believe that science, "in its quest for knowledge," will prove evolution wrong. I am curious as to what laws of physics and chemistry evolution seems to bend. The fact remains that bacteria are made out of the same "stuff" we are. They even have the same genetic code. Don't cross your fingers, Brandon. I don't think your letter sparked any Ackerl Hall faculty to drop their research and try to disprove evolution.

Enrollment might go online

AMY EBERT
Kansas State Collegian

Students might soon have the chance to enroll in classes at K-State from the comfort of their own homes.

The K-State Access Technology System will allow students to enroll on the telephone or through the Internet.

Rather than standing in line at Willard Hall, students can log on to KATS and enroll.

The process is still in the works; Gunile Devault, associate registrar, said she is unsure about whether or not the system will be available this spring for fall 1998 enrollment.

"We are unsure if it will be available for students to use this spring because it takes time to make significant changes like this one," she said.

The enrollment on KATS is a phase-three project on the KATS system.

Only phase one has been implemented for student use.

Phase one includes services such as semester grades, schedules and statement of account status.

When the new enrollment system is completed, students would not have to go to Willard Hall to enroll, but they must still meet with an adviser to get the OK to enroll, Devault said.

"The student's advisers must log into KATS and change the adviser flag to yes, which will then allow the students to enroll themselves," Devault said.

The reason for the adviser flag is to ensure that all students are still getting the required signature or permission, she said.

"Much of the enrollment process is visual now, such as signatures and ID cards, and we have to get that visual process done electronically," Devault said.

There are advantages to the upcoming option for enrollment, Devault said.

"Students have the convenience of doing it from their dorm room, home, New Mexico or anywhere else," she said.

One adviser agrees that there are benefits to this program.

Larry Erpelding, associate director of agriculture academic programs, said there are more advantages than just convenience.

"As we move into the technology era even more, it helps our students become more computer-oriented," he said.

Devault and Erpelding also said there are disadvantages to the KATS enrollment process, too.

"Change is hard for some. I think our biggest disadvantage is that it is different than what's been done in the past," Devault said.

There is a $3 charge for using the service.

Erpelding said he is concerned the charge might keep students from using the service.

"With the $3 fee, I don't know to what extent students will actually use it," he said.

When a student enrolls through KATS, a charge will be added to the student's statement of account.

Aleasha Svaty, junior in pre-professional elementary education, said a charge would probably make her use conventional means to enroll instead of KATS.

"I probably wouldn't use it if I was charged," she said.

Even though the service might not be available for the next enrollment period, Erpelding said he plans to use it when it is available.

"I'm anxious to try it out and see how it all works and comes together," he said.

Iraq's opposition badly divided despite suggestions of support

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAIRO, Egypt — More than a year ago, over the rugged hills and mountains of northern Iraq, Saddam Hussein's forces and their allies poured into the ancient town of Irbil, killing and arresting hundreds of Iraqis working to overthrow Saddam.

The dissidents, supported by the CIA, lost everything: their headquarters in Iraq as well as the radio transmitters, computers and printing presses that were the tools of their resistance.

This week, U.S. lawmakers suggested supporting Iraqi opposition groups and creating a "Radio Free Iraq" as a complement to the air strikes Washington has threatened to force Iraq into allowing U.N. inspectors unhindered access to all weapons sites.

But since the August 1996 debacle in Irbil, the Iraqi opposition has been a movement divided, with little sign of support inside Iraq, even less outside and scarce hope for a change in government.

To many dissidents, the United States seems less a source of backing than a source of betrayal — from Irbil to the rebellions in Iraq's north and south after the 1991 Persian Gulf War. Then, the United States seemed to encourage the revolts, only to stand by as Saddam's elite Republican Guards ruthlessly crushed them.

"There are a lot of bad feelings and bad blood here," said Ahmed Chalabi, who leads the Iraqi National Congress, an umbrella group in London that seeks to unite the numerous groups.

Opposition to Saddam's relentlessly repressive rule long has struggled with political, ethnic and religious divisions.

At one time, the INC succeeded in bringing together Shiite Muslim groups, former ruling party officials and Kurdish guerrillas seeking autonomy in northern Iraq. But the broad coalition crumbled over the years, hampered by internal divisions, a lack of resources and what the group saw as wavering U.S. support.

The final blow came in 1996 in Irbil during fighting between rival Iraqi Kurdish groups. One of them, the Kurdistan Democratic Party, sided with Saddam, allowing his forces to storm northern Iraq and wipe out the INC's membership and base of operations — without U.S. intervention in a region it had promised to protect.

The group's defeat marked the failure, too, of the CIA's low-key support for the Iraqi opposition, which had included helping it make press releases, books, and radio and television broadcasts.

"Irbil was the worst setback by far, for U.S. policy and for the opposition," Chalabi said in an interview.

On Monday, British and American diplomats met with Iraqi dissident leaders in London for 1-1/2 hours. No proposals were made, however, to provide more support for the opposition.

"It was just an exploration of possibilities," said Iyad Alawi, who leads the Iraqi National Accord, another group in London.

He said "To receive a delegation from the opposition is something, and to implement policies that would help the opposition and the Iraqis — real policies — is something else."

'Tonight Show' employs K-State intern

SARA ZENGER
Kansas State Collegian

A summer in sunny California rubbing elbows with celebrities might seem like a vacation to some.

But as one K-State student learned last summer, working in Hollywood isn't just fun in the sun.

Emily Mullen, senior in journalism and mass communications, worked as an intern for "The Tonight Show with Jay Leno." She said some days she was so busy she didn't even realize she missed lunch.

"There was always something to do. We were running things everywhere. There were tapes to be edited, tapes to pick up and filing to do," Mullen said.

Mullen said her adviser, Paul Prince, associate professor of journalism and mass communications, encouraged her to apply for the internship.

"I said I wanted to work in television. For some reason, he told me to go to Hollywood, and I took his word for it," Mullen said.

Prince told her about Dave Berg, a K-State graduate who is now a segment producer for "The Tonight Show." Berg was Mullen's connection to the internship.

"I bugged him constantly for about five months. Then he told me in April whom I should send my résumé to. She called me within a week of receiving my résumé and told me I had the job," Mullen said.

Mullen said competition for the internship is tough. "The Tonight Show" received more than 100 résumés, and only 10 interns were chosen.

Interns at the show are given a variety of responsibilities.

"It was goofy, funny work. It fascinated me completely," Mullen said.

One of Mullen's duties as an intern was sorting the piles of newspapers the show receives.

"The producers and writers all need these papers to write jokes. About 13 people had to get up to 13 papers each," Mullen said.

Not all of Mullen's jobs were routine. She was the first intern at the show to assist with segment production. She said the relationship she developed with the production assistants gave her this opportunity.

Mullen helped produce segments featuring Rob Lowe and Evander Holyfield.

"Before a guest goes on the show, the producer and the guest go over stories that he or she could tell. I got to type up a briefing of the best stories for Jay," Mullen said. "We also just made sure the stars were happy."

Even though Mullen was able to see a few famous people, she said the interns weren't allowed to approach the guests.

"One girl went up to Conan O'Brien, and she was sent home to New York," Mullen said.

Mullen said part of production that surprised her the most was the lack of spontaneity on the show.

"Everything to the last detail is planned. They make it look so easy," Mullen said.

The host of the show also impressed her.

"One day I was cleaning the kitchen and Leno asked me, 'So what do you think of the TV business now?'" Mullen said. "He was a very humorous guy — the kind of person that would take the time to talk to an intern."

Working on a television show had some extra advantages.

"We shared the same lot with Days of Our Lives, and I love that show," Mullen said. "I would eat at the commissary, and there would be Bo, one of the show's stars."

Along with technical knowledge, Prince said this experience also gives the intern a crash course in the real world.

"You get a good sense of how much nerve you really have, how brave you are and how resourceful," Prince said. "You can't panic when NBC asks you to do something you've never done in a city you just got to."

Even though Mullen still wants to find a job in television production, she said her internship experience changed her future plans.

"Before this, all I wanted to do was graduate and get out of here," Mullen said. "Now I'm more ready to stay here closer to my family. I liked L.A., but don't ever want to live there."

Mullen said even if this internship doesn't help her land that first job, the experience gave her something that no one can take away.

"Hopefully it will help me get started, but even if it doesn't it gave me so much confidence," Mullen said. "I loved every minute of it."

Students work with Kansas Legislature

NATE JENKINS
Kansas State Collegian

Jeremy Claeys goes straight for the newspaper rack when he arrives in Topeka at about 1 p.m., but unlike most news junkies, he isn't there to absorb the headlines.

Skipping the front page without guilt, Claeys finds the letters to the editor and reads every word.

It's part of his job.

As an intern for Rep. Janice Pauls, D-Hutchinson, Claeys' responsibility is to keep a finger on the public's pulse and give Pauls the reading.

Claeys, sophomore in electronic journalism and political science, said the drive he makes to Topeka at least twice a week is worth the trip.

"I'm always looking for things she may want to correct or expand on, based on what the public is asking about," Claeys said. "I get to talk to constituents on the phone about their concerns. It's the best."

Claeys was also a Kansas Legislature intern last spring. He said negotiating his way around the Statehouse isn't new to him. Neither is the game of politics.

As a student at Sacred Heart High School in Salina, Claeys was involved in student government. He joined the K-State chapter of the Young Democrats shortly after arriving in Manhattan. He said he would eventually like to run for office, but his short-term goal is to work on a large state or national campaign.

"I got a taste of it when I was the campus coordinator for Ron Henneberg last year," Claeys said. "It's definitely something I'd like to do more of."

For now, though, Claeys said he is happy with what he is doing.

"You really get a good sense of how the Legislature affects real people," he said.

Rob Macdougall, junior in political science and social work, said he hopes his internship can help him utilize the legislative process in the future, when he works outside the political arena.

Like Claeys, Macdougall receives university credit for his weekly work in the Statehouse, but he said he doesn't aspire to hold public office.

"My main reason for doing the internship is to learn how the legislature works. I want to learn how to play the game, but I don't want to play it as a career," Macdougall said. "Shifting back to the real world is more important to me, because I want to work with people on a direct basis."

Macdougall said the man he works for, Rep. Rocky Nichols, D-Topeka, is interested in some of the same issues that he is.

"One reason I was hooked up with Rocky after I got the internship is because I'm interested in mental and general health issues like he is," he said.

Macdougall said he keeps his eyes open to a myriad of topics and issues, and updates Nichols the best he can.

"Politicians are human — they can't know about everything that is going on," he said.

"Rocky relies on the communication we keep with constituents so that he can pick and choose his battles."

He said believes there is a connection between Statehouse meeting rooms and citizens on the streets.

"Not long ago, a guy off the streets came to Rocky's secretary with a list of senators' names," Macdougall said. "He had a spacey look to him, he obviously hadn't showered in a long time, and it was pretty clear that he had mental problems."

"He said that the police and some senators had a conspiracy against him personally and that they were trying to kill him with different drugs. He came right off the street like that," he said.

"Rocky got a telephone number from him, and the next day I tried to refer him to a mental hospital to get him help. It didn't work out," Macdougall said. "All you can do is keep trying."

K-State's Career and Employment Services provides link to summer internships, experience for future jobs

SARA ZENGER
Kansas State Collegian

Students who want summer internships should start looking now, said staff at Career and Employment Services.

Mary Marston, assistant director of experiential learning at Career and Employment Services, said employers are hiring now for summer positions.

"We always have internships available, but students should start looking for internships at least a semester before they want to go out," Marston said.

Marston said internships give students valuable experience, and they are also opportunities to try out different jobs. "Internships give students the chance to test different careers. If you work as a nurse for a summer and hate it, then you know you don't want to be a nurse," Marston said.

Students registered at Career and Employment Services have access to JobLine, which lists both full and part-time job openings.

Career and Employment Services' Web page also offers links to Internet sites that find internships anywhere in the world.

Academic departments or colleges are other good links to possible internships. Marston said she also suggests asking advisers or faculty members involved in the students area of interest.

Becky Blake, director of the Manhattan Convention and Visitor's Bureau, said the bureau and the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce has hired interns for a number of years.

Blake said hiring an intern allows the convention and visitor's bureau to complete projects that wouldn't be possible with only the permanent staff.

"It's an excellent opportunity for us to provide valuable experience for the student, as well as it benefits our organization," Blake said.

Shana Krainbill, junior in hotel and restaurant management, is working as an intern for the convention and visitor's bureau.

She said many of her responsibilities focus on keeping in contact with organizations that meet in Manhattan and bringing new conventions and meetings to the area.

"It's a different outlook on hospitality. It's getting people to come to our town and eat in our restaurants and stay in our hotels," Krainbill said. "It gives me a little bit more of the business aspect of the industry, too. Computers and fax machines are things you're not around all day when you're waitressing at a restaurant."

Marston said all students should consider finding an internship.

"Anybody from a freshman on up would benefit. The earlier you start working, the better. The more experience you have and the more varied your experience is will help you get a job in the end," Marston said.

Just as anyone would benefit from an internship, there is an internship to match anyone's interest.

"Disney World, Worlds of Fun, ski camps, dude ranches and cruise ships are just some of the places looking for interns," Marston said. "Internships are a good way to travel."

Marston said Career and Employment Services has more internship applications than students to fill them.

"It's a well-kept secret that these opportunities are out there," Marston said. "Everybody has a summer job. Getting an internship not only helps you get job experience but also broadens your horizons."

Academy Award nominations spotlight older performers acting in motion pictures

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. — The Academy Award nominees Tuesday included performers whose heydays were the '60s, the '70s — and even the '30s.

Four show business veterans who haven't been much in the Hollywood spotlight for years were honored with Oscar nominations. The comeback kids: Burt Reynolds, Peter Fonda, Julie Christie and Gloria Stuart.

The 87-year-old Stuart became the oldest performer nominated for an acting award, getting a nod for best supporting actress for her depiction of the 101-year-old Rose DeWitt Bukater in "Titanic."

The actress was a star of the 1930s, where her credits included "The Old Dark House," "Air Mail" and "Gold Diggers of 1935." She has spent most of the past several decades painting, gardening and traveling.

Christie, 56, was nominated for the role of a faded actress in a troubled marriage in "Afterglow." She was last nominated 26 years ago for "McCabe and Mrs. Miller." She won an Oscar for her performance in the 1965 film "Darling." Of her five films in the 1990s — including "Fools of Fortune" and "The Railway Station Man" — few attracted any attention.

Reynolds, who turns 62 on Wednesday, was nominated for best supporting actor for his depiction of adult filmmaker Jack Horner in "Boogie Nights." It was the "Deliverance" star's first Oscar nomination. He also won a Golden Globe in January for the role.

Reynolds' last films have all fizzled: "Striptease," "Citizen Ruth," "Two if by Sea," "The Madding" and "Mad Dog Time."

Fonda, who shot to fame as the writer and co-star of 1969's "Easy Rider," was nominated for best actor for his role as the beekeeper Ulee Jackson in "Ulee's Gold." The performance also won him a Golden Globe last month.

Like many of his comeback peers, the 58-year-old Fonda's most recent work has gone largely unseen: "Grace of My Heart" and "Bodies, Rest & Motion."

But Fonda, son of the late film legend Henry Fonda, said he hadn't really gone away.

"You just haven't gone to the art houses. I make 1.2 movies a year. This was just a part that got a lot of critical acclaim," he said.

"I'm a lucky actor to be employed at the moment and to be nominated for this very prestigious award," he said. "I carried my dad's watch during the movie for good luck. I've got it on now."

HALO to sponsor preview of TCI's Spanish network

SARA ZENGER
Kansas State Collegian

K-State is getting a sneak peek at Univision, a Spanish TV network coming to Manhattan cable.

The Univision-athon, sponsored by the Hispanic American Leadership Organization, is from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. every day this week on the first floor of the K-State Student Union.

Carlos Contreras, sophomore in business and public relations coordinator for HALO, said he hopes this event will introduce the network to the campus.

"Our purpose originally was for this to be the final push in our campaign to have Univision, but since then it has been established that Univision will be coming to Manhattan. We thought this would now be a chance to promote the channel and make the public aware of it," Contreras said.

Univision will be broadcast from midnight to noon on channel 19 beginning March 1.

HALO President Leo Prieto, junior in pre-law, Spanish and Latin American studies, said Univision has something for everyone.

"We're showing a variety of the programming Univision has, like sports, cartoons, talk shows and soap operas, that everyone can benefit from," Prieto said.

Gayle Spencer, coordinator of student activities and services, said she was introduced to Spanish television while she lived in Houston. Now she is looking forward to watching Univision in Manhattan.

"I probably watched it every other day in Houston. It was good just to learn more about another culture," Spencer said. "I liked to watch the soap operas. They were awesome. Crazy."

Even though people in HALO said they are excited about bringing Univision to Manhattan, they're still hoping the community will eventually have full-time access to the channel.

"We consider the decision to have it half a day only one step. Our goal is to have it 24 hours," Contreras said.

Prieto said the Univision-athon has helped gain support for a channel just for Univision.

"This is only the beginning," Prieto said. "We had people come around yesterday, watched it and wanted to sign more petitions."

Prieto said the Univision-athon can be a good break in a busy day.

"In between classes come out, check out the programming and relax a little," he said.

Along with the preview of Univision programming, HALO is also selling raffle tickets for a chance to win dinner for two at El Cazador in Manhattan. Tickets will be sold all week, and the drawing will be around noon Friday.

Johnson receives e-mail, letters of support

"I hear from alumni and former students who had a valuable educational experience in journalism at the Collegian and don't want it diminished or taken away from current students," Johnson said.

Johnson said the support has helped him through a difficult time.

"It's been overwhelming. I don't know if I've ever seen such a generous outpouring of support. I can't express how much I appreciate it," he said.

Johnson said the situation is a complex one, but former students and colleagues who are familiar with Student Publications Inc. are quick to offer support, he said.

"A number of our alumni and friends have been aware of our problems here in recent years. I think that has helped them understand the gravity of the situation," he said.

Not all of what Johnson hears is positive. He said he has received words of caution from two people and a carbon copy of the opposing view.

The carbon said Johnson's firing was not a content issue, then proceeded to disagree with him for not restraining the Collegian when it makes mistakes, Johnson said.

Peter Nicholls, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, said he has also received feedback about the board's decision.

Nicholls said he has heard mostly from people who have worked with Johnson or known him professionally.

Most of them have been in support of Johnson, he said.

"I have also received one or two communications from individuals with questions about his performance, but by far the majority has been in support of him," Nicholls said.

Nicholls said he responds to the e-mails by telling the sender about the situation as he understands it.

"I have assured all those concerned that Ron Johnson's contract will be honored, and he will be treated fairly. We have an obligation to do that," he said.

Tobacco manufacturer admits to adding excessive nicotine

To hide the invention from competitors, Brown & Williamson shipped seed to Brazil, where the variety was grown in commercial quantities. Brown & Williamson told the FDA it had imported Y-1 leaf from Brazil, used it in five cigarette brands sold in the United States in 1993 and 1994, and had a stockpile of about 3 million pounds.

Although this was legal, the FDA was concerned enough to disclose its findings to Congress in July 1994. Brown & Williamson promptly announced that "because of concerns and doubts raised by FDA," it had stopped the Y-1 project and would no longer add the variety to Raleigh Lights, Richland Lights King Size, Viceroy King Size, Viceroy Lights

Kingsize and Richland King Size cigarettes.

But the company was using Y-1 again within a year, according to Black's deposition. Black's testimony is described in a letter by Brian Campf, an attorney for one of the plaintiffs in the New York suit.

Campf wrote to Justice Charles E. Ramos on Jan. 23, urging him to make the deposition public. The letter says in part: "Mr. Black testified that in 1995, B&W secretly began using Y-1 again in even more brands of cigarettes and at a greater total volume than it did before it temporarily halted Y-1 use in 1994, and that B&W continues to use Y-1 tobacco today."

Campf's letter added, "The public has been duped, and there is immense public interest in setting the record straight."

Hometown hero wins skiing gold medal

NAGANO, Japan — The Great One finally hit the Winter Olympics, only to take a backseat to a local hero: speedskater Hiroyasu Shimizu, the first Japanese gold medalist at the Nagano Games.

Shimizu, cheered wildly by his countrymen and Crown Prince Naruhito, set his second Olympic record in as many days in his exhilarating triumph in the men's 500-meter competition.

Shimizu's sizzling run — only Japan's fourth gold ever in the Winter Games — overshadowed the arrival of Wayne Gretzky and the continued blast of wintry weather that turned skiing and snowboarding into an icy demolition derby for many.

After three days of snow-related postponements, officials hoped to finally award an Alpine skiing medal. The women's super-G, featuring 1994 Olympic star Picabo Street, was scheduled for Wednesday.

The American Olympians were still 0-for-Nagano as the first week of the games hit its midpoint.

Shimizu got to stay indoors, at the new M-Wave arena, for his medal. The speedskater dissolved into tears as his fans raised the Japanese flag during his victory lap.

"My dream to be the Olympic champion has finally come true," Shimizu said. "My father in heaven is the first person I told."

American apologizes for bomb reference

NAGANO, Japan — A U.S. luge team spokesman admits he used a poor choice of words by mentioning the "atom bomb" in discussing the flap over gold medalist Georg Hackl's racing booties.

After Hackl took the lead in the first run of the singles Sunday, the United States and Canada protested the new booties that he and other German racers wore. Spokesman Sandy Caligiore told Nagano 98, the games' official newspaper, that Hackl probably would have done well even if he'd worn snowshoes.

"He's just that kind of racer. It's like giving a superpower the atom bomb," Caligiore told the paper.

The protest was thrown out, and Hackl won his third straight gold medal Monday.

"It was within the confines of the sport of luge," Caligiore said Tuesday. "We're talking about a German luge racer and the technological advances he had over other luges, period."

"In using hyperbole, maybe I should have used a different analogy."

Japan is the only country that the atomic bomb has been used against.

American skater falls during first practice

NAGANO, Japan — She looked a bit ragged and fell hard on her first jump, but Michelle Kwan said she felt great after her first practice since arriving at the Winter Games.

The gold medal favorite's appearance at the White Ring arena left Nicole Bobek as the only member of the strong U.S. women's figure skating team not in Japan.

Kwan worked out in the practice rink Tuesday. She fell hard on her first jump, a triple lutz, but then skated without mishap, if not in top form.

Even if it didn't look that great, it was on Japanese ice, in the shadow of the arena where she will be the favorite. And that gave Kwan a special feeling.

"I feel so great. I got into Tokyo, arrived here and wanted to stay up 30 minutes longer just to see what it is like," she said. "I feel a little slow because of jet lag, but I'm trying to stay up."

Canadian hockey coach announces lines

NAGANO, Japan — The Canadian hockey team got right down to business on its Vancouver-to-Tokyo flight.

During a team meeting, coach Marc Crawford went over what he expects to be his four line combinations and three defensive pairings. Crawford also told his three goaltenders that Patrick Roy would be No. 1 in net.

The lines: Wayne Gretzky centering Keith Primeau and Steve Yzerman; Eric Lindros centering Shayne Corson and Rod Brind'Amour; Joe Sakic centering Brendan Shanahan and Trevor Linden; and Joe Nieuwendyk centering Rob Zamuner and Theo Fleury.

The defensive pairings: Chris Pronger and Adam Foote; Ray Bourque and Rob Blake; and Kevin Stevens and either Al MacInnis or Eric Desjardins.

If left wing Paul Kariya is recovered enough from his concussion to play, Crawford said, "he would take a very substantial role."

Injured athlete makes trip to games as fan

NAGANO, Japan — At the start of the season, Cary Mullen was one of Canada's leading Olympic medal prospects. Then came a horrific crash during a race at Beaver Creek, Colo., in December.

Mullen was turned sideways as he reached the final jump on the course. His head smashed down on the frozen racing surface, knocking him unconscious. He flipped several hundred feet before coming to rest near the finish line.

He suffered a concussion that left him with double vision, and the time needed to recover cost him any chance of competing at Nagano.

Mullen decided to make the trip anyway, to cheer on his teammates. Asked how he was feeling, a big smile broke across his face. "I'm glad to see just one of you," he said.

Nagano nugget

NAGANO, Japan — After three days of competition, the United States was looking for its first medal of the games. American athletes had won two golds and a silver at the same point of the Lillehammer Games four years ago.

Cats ready for traditional home opener

► CATS DEBUT AGAINST MISSOURI WESTERN FOR 5TH-STRAIGHT YEAR.

JEREMY KELLEY

When K-State baseball coach Mike Clark was asked if his team would be playing a "weaker" opponent for the home opener, he didn't agree.

"I don't know about that," Clark said. "Let's not call my alma mater weaker."

Clark's alma mater, Missouri Western, comes into town today to battle the Wildcats in the home opener at 3 p.m. in Frank Myers Field.

But let the record show that for the past two seasons, the Cats have spanked the Griffons handily. Last year, K-State scored 10 runs in the first three innings and cruised to a 17-6 victory.

"It was kind of like spring training," Clark said after that game. "We just wanted to get these guys some innings."

Exactly. In the 1996 season it was even worse. K-State handed the Griffons a 28-7 loss on 26 hits.

So the verdict is in, but no one really wants to read it.

The Cats are coming off a 1-1 tournament finish at the Just For Feet Showdown in Peoria, Ariz., last weekend. A seemingly easy 8-0 win against Indiana has given the Cats an air of confidence for the coming season.

"That was a great way to start out," designated hitter Brian Bobier said. "Our defense was real solid, and we turned a lot of double-play balls and got some good experience on the field."

Experience on the field is just what the Cats are looking for this time of year.

"We have been inside for a long time, and everyone wants to get outside," third baseman Josh Marn said. "We'll have to get used to the weather — whatever it will be — but at least we'll be outside."

This game will give K-State the opportunity to play a bulk of its new guys — a number of community college transfers and inexperienced Division-I players.

"We do have a number of young guys, and we need to get them on the field," Clark said. "These first couple of games will give us the opportunity to see where guys are at and what kind of talent we have."

The Cats have lost some pro-baseball talent from the team of a year ago, but that could make this year's team more competitive.

"Talent-wise this year we're not going to have seven or eight guys drafted into the majors," Marn said. "I think the team will be more cohesive this year, and everyone will be scratching and biting for a position, and that will make us a more competitive team."

Bobier reiterated Marn's comments. "Our mental approach may be stronger than last year," Bobier said. "We know we can't get complacent like we did at this time last year. We had an 11-game losing streak last year, and we can't have that again this year."

I THINK THE TEAM WILL BE MORE COHESIVE THIS YEAR, AND EVERYONE WILL BE SCRATCHING AND BITING FOR A POSITION.

Texas is a university steeped in women's collegiate basketball tradition — in fact, Wildcat associate head coach Kamie Ethridge led the 1986 Longhorns to the national championship, winning MVP honors in the process.

"There's only one thing that keeps Coach Ethridge disloyal to Texas," Coach Deb Patterson said, "and that's when this K-State team plays them."

Tonight in Austin, Ethridge will take the court in Frank Erwin Center as a K-State coach for the first time. Last season, the Cats met the Longhorns in Manhattan, where then-senior point guard Missy Decker nailed two last-second free throws for the 69-67 victory.

The University of Texas (10-12 overall, 4-6 in Big 12 play) sits tied for fifth place in the Big 12 conference, one game behind the Wildcats.

But K-State (14-6, 5-5) coach Tom Asbury said he thinks Texas has the talent and potential to rise to second place.

"They only have two seniors, but they don't even start," Asbury said. "They start two great freshmen. Watch out for them down the road, and down the road could be Wednesday."

The two freshmen Longhorns, guard Luke Axtell and center Chris Mihm, have repeatedly been awarded Big 12 Rookie-of-the-Week honors — Mihm twice and Axtell three times this season.

Wildcat-Jayhawk basketball rivalry lacks old-time traditions

One week removed from the game of the year in Chapel Hill, N.C., hoops fans can now shift their attention to B r a m l a g e Coliseum, host to the remaining shreds of what was once the finest rivalry in college basketball.

Fred McCoy vs. Chris Piper.

Will Scott vs. Milt Newton.

Mitch Richmond vs. Danny Manning.

Ten years ago, these were the matchups dreams were made of. On playgrounds and in gymnasiums across Kansas, grade-schoolers reconstructed these classic duels again and again, each child carrying the weight of a university on his shoulders.

K-State vs. KU. In 1988, these words made time stop. The prospect of a game between the Cats and the Hawks made us drop everything. It made us anxious. It made us mad. It made us proud. It made us hate our best friends. It made us wear the same ratty purple T-shirt to school for three straight weeks.

In 1988, basketball lovers in Kansas rode this roller coaster of emotions four times in eight weeks as the Wildcats and Jayhawks traded blows all the way to the finals of the Midwest Regional in the NCAA Tournament.

Round one: Jan. 31 — Paced by Richmond's 35 points and anchored by eight free throws in the final minute, K-State sent KU's 55-game home winning streak up in flames with a 72-61 upset. KU would lose to Duke and Oklahoma in Allen Fieldhouse later that season before avenging both losses in the Final Four.

Round two: Feb. 18 — Four days after scoring 41 points in a 112-95 home loss to Oklahoma, Richmond managed only 11 during KU's final trip to Ahearn Field House. Kevin Pritchard's clutch three-pointer in the final 30 seconds clinched a 64-63 Jayhawk victory. Four KU starters scored in double digits.

Round three: March 12 — A balanced attack by K-State doomed KU from the start. Will Scott's giant ears zeroed in on the basket like radars as the shooting guard hit for 17 points. Sophomore Steve Henson scored 18, and Richmond scored 21. Both Scott and Richmond made three of five three-point attempts as K-State advanced to the Big 8 Tournament final, 69-54.

Round four: March 27 — In the mother of all Kansas days, K-State and KU clashed at the Silverdome in Pontiac, Mich., with a Final Four berth at stake. K-State led 29-27 at halftime but was outscored 44-29 in the second half. Manning paced the Jayhawks with 20, but of all people, it was Scooter Barry who saved the day for KU with 15 points on near-flawless shooting.

Again, 11 was the unlucky number for Richmond, who produced an inauspicious career finale. While Manning went on to become the first pick in the 1988 NBA Draft, Richmond would earn Rookie of the Year honors.

Ten years later, it's impossible not to wonder, "What if?" Given K-State's memorable 1988 season, which included two wins over KU, one win over Oklahoma in Norman and one win over No. 1 seed Purdue in the Midwest semifinal, it's difficult to say K-State couldn't have won two more games in Kemper Arena the way KU did.

KU's year-long probation for recruiting violations in 1989 was a small price to pay for a national championship trophy. Since then, KU has returned to the Final Four twice, and Roy Williams enjoys one of the best winning percentages in college basketball. Of all its players in 1988, only Manning would be guaranteed a spot in KU's starting lineup this year.

But fate hasn't been kind to K-State basketball. After scattering three brief NCAA Tournament stints over nine years, K-State remains mired in a slump that dates back at least five seasons. Every current Jayhawk and Wildcat was in high school when K-State last beat KU. Worse yet, K-State hasn't beaten KU in Manhattan since 1983.

K-State recently won its first conference road game in two seasons. With the exception of Manny Dies, any of K-State's current players would have started about as often as a Yugo in the dead of winter for the 1988 team.

In 1988, the Big 8 boasted the nation's best senior class and college basketball's toughest competition. The Wildcats' second-place finish actually meant something 10 years ago. Today, K-State's fifth-place Big 12 ranking speaks more about the conference's weakness than the team's strength.

People used to refer to K-State's basketball team as "we" and "us." Today, it's "they" and "them."

Unfortunately, they will always be them. That is, until "we" beat KU.

Senior spends last year planning concert

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

When the curtain rises on the Fourth Annual K-State Jazz Festival on Friday, Jena Pralle will be watching and praying.

Pralle, senior in music education, has been involved, in one way or another, with the development of what could easily be called the Count Basie Festival at K-State. Each year, the festival has grown in attendance and events, and each year Pralle has moved deeper and deeper into the decision-making it takes to pull it off.

A typical K-State student in Wildcat logo-adorned clothes, Pralle was cool and collected for someone organizing a jazz festival and speaking loudly to overcome the roar of the fountains in the McCain Auditorium atrium.

She was prepared to spend yet another late night in McCain working through the last-minute details of the festival — high schools wanting to bring one more student, scheduling issues and the urgent calls for ticket availability. It's sold out. Dennis Wilson, director of jazz studies and director of the festival, is in New York City until Friday and Pralle has been calling and e-mailing him with questions all day.

"The decisions I make now at first scared me to death," Pralle said. "Now, I think I almost know so closely what would come out of his mouth that I'm not as scared."

Pralle might be the busiest person on campus this week, but she's keeping it in perspective.

"To have been through what seems like the toughest years of the festival — getting the word out, making a name for yourself, selling Count Basie every year — it's neat to see it has evolved into such a success," Pralle said. "I've never worked so closely to something like this before. After the first year, I actually cried. There were no more plans to be made — it was all over."

Each year for the past three years the Count Basie Orchestra has come to K-State, the concert always has featured a grand finale combining the Basie band and K-State's Concert Jazz Ensemble, in which Pralle plays bass.

Although she's developed a friendship with the renowned Basie band, she hasn't decided what she wants to pursue after she finishes school in December.

"Mr. Wilson has taught me to network, as he calls it," Pralle said, insisting on calling Wilson by his last name even though the two have worked closely for more than three years. "I have this hangup with calling him Dennis — maybe because he's my teacher."

Pralle, a Herkimer, Kan., native, picked up the bass her eighth grade year after her junior high music teacher asked her to fill in for a vacancy. She's played piano since first grade.

She describes her transition from high school band to the Concert Jazz Ensemble as overwhelming.

"I had not played with such accomplished musicians before," she said. "I'll miss that after I graduate. Jazz is such a different musical setting — it's relaxed but it's intense."

Pralle, who is getting married this summer, said she has considered going into the production side of the music business, especially after honing her skills working with the jazz festival. A recent trip to the International Association of Jazz Educators conference in New York has given her even more to consider.

"Most of the jobs are the east or west coasts, and I don't know if I want to move," she said. "It's also where all the artists are. When we went to New York it was a real eye-opener."

Pralle seems most interested in a career in music education, perhaps on the high school level so she can bring her students to a future K-State Jazz Festival.

"I'm not the huge performer type," she said.

"If and when I'm ever a band director, we'll definitely be there."

Funkdoobiest's newest album elicits memories of Run DMC, Cypress Hill

PHIL KELLUM
Kansas State Collegian

If Cypress Hill is the king of Latin hip hop, then Funkdoobiest is right behind.

It makes sense too, because Cypress Hill's DJ Muggs formed the band in 1993. On Funkdoobiest's new album, "The Troubleshooters," the band sounds more than a little bit like Cypress Hill. But that's OK.

Sondoobie alternates between a mellow, slow vocal style and his trademark "doobie speech," which is more hyper and crazy. He also switches between English and Spanish lyrics rather freely.

Sondoobie gets the listener set up for a wild ride with the first track, "Doobie Show," where he introduces the cast of characters as if he were a band-leader on some long lost 1950s TV variety show.

"Papi Chulo," the first single, is easily the best track. It uses a sample from Squirrel Nut Zippers' hit tune "Hell" as the basis of the track. It works really well. The beats are deep with some great acoustic bass grooves as well.

The song also features Daz from Tha Dogg Pound.

For those who miss the days when Cypress Hill and House of Pain ruled the rap charts, you'll love "On The Premises."

The beats sound like the old Soul Assassins production with simple, spare beats.

Funkdoobiest covers Bill Withers' soul hit "Just the Two of Us" on "The Anthem."

The lyrics of "Just the Two of Us" are replaced with "It's Funkdoobiest."

Some of the singing parts just crack me up.

The track alternates between singing and rapping parts with guest rapper L.C. kicking out a fast and furious bit that sounds pretty tough.

"Act On It" has an old school, Run DMC-ish style sound and feel. Ralph M.'s scratching is really cool, too.

Sondoobie manipulates Tom Tom Club lyrics from "Genius of Love" into something new on "Natural Fun."

I liked the short interlude of "Tribal Flutes," a 49-second bit of flutes and tribal beats. It was a great intro to "Five Deadly Indians," a tribal-sounding tune in tribute to former Funkdoobiest member Tomahawk Funk.

The intro to "Five Deadly Indians" sounds like it was lifted from some documentary about the genocide and elimination of the Native Americans in the 1800s. The only problem with the track is there are too many samples going on at once.

There must be at least three all at the same time. If you're really looking for some true Cypress Hill-sounding beats, check out "Holdin' It Down." It sounds just like old Cypress used to sound. The beats are ominous and reminiscent of DJ Muggs' sound.

"I'm Feelin' It" sounds like a great party tune to get everyone moving at your next party.

Sondoobie even gives a nod to Digital Underground when he says he'll "make your Humpty Hump hump."

The album closes with a Spanish version of "Papi Chulo."

"The Troubleshooters" also features an enhanced part to play on your computer, which is actually pretty lame. It's just the Funkdoobiest biography, part of the video for "Papi Chulo" and an ad for the band's World Wide Web page.

You can also open a link to the Web page, but you have to install America Online to do so. The video is cool, but that's about it.

All in all, this is an all right album. Look for it used.

Cats try to follow Nebraska win against Longhorns in Bramlage

Axtell won the honor last week after a 24-point game in the Longhorns' 88-73 victory over Oklahoma State on Jan. 31. In Texas's past three home games, Axtell is 16-for-25 (.640) from behind the three-point arc.

"Axtell's shooting 45 percent on threes for the year," Asbury said. "You think he's taking a poor shot selection on some of them, and sometimes they don't go in, but look at what he's done this year. He's really getting it done."

Keeping Axtell from getting it done in Bramlage Coliseum will be just one of many challenges for the Cats. However, the 6-foot-9-inch Longhorn is not the tallest player of Texas's starters — Mihm is 7 feet tall.

"They pose big problems," Asbury said. "Who do we put on Axtell? He's a two-guard. We've got major matchup problems."

Asbury said he's expecting a fast-paced, up-and-down the court game, one in which the Cats must control the tempo from the outset.

"Texas is awfully athletic and big and pretty young," he said. "They're a team that frightens you. They play a non-predictable, unconventional game."

The Cats' game plan isn't any different than usual — Asbury said defending Axtell's three-point shooting, keeping the Longhorns off the boards and handling traps will be the difference in the game.

"Sometimes it's like their best play is a missed shot," he said. "Their players go to the boards and just dunk everything. They play more teams like us than we play like them, which will be to their advantage as far as preparation is concerned."

Like every other Big 12 team but Kansas, Texas has struggled on the road. The Longhorns picked up their lone road conference win vs. intrastate rival Texas A&M on Feb. 2, an 81-80 thriller decided at the final buzzer.

K-State got the Big 12 road monkey off its back Saturday at Nebraska, with a 69-63 victory at the Bob Devaney Sports Center.

The Cats have now won three of the past four games, and four of the next six will be played in Bramlage.

"It was good to get the win at Nebraska and get rid of the endless questions about road wins," Asbury said. "We've moved from a four-way tie for seventh place in the conference to a four-way tie for fifth."

Women's team faces challenge at Texas

With the Longhorns (9-11 overall, 4-6 in Big 12 play) only a game ahead of the Cats in the Big 12, Patterson said she's hoping this year's matchup won't be so thrilling.

"Texas has struggled a bit," she said. "They lost a big post player at the beginning of the season to an ACL injury. They're a young team, but we seem like newborns compared to Texas."

Longhorn senior center Angela Jackson only averages 28 minutes a game, but her 16.6 points and 6.9 rebounds per game point her out as a leader on the court. Sophomore forward Edwina Brown is the only Longhorn with a higher points-per-game average, 17, than Jackson, but nine players' scoring averages are in the double figures.

"Jackson is the go-to senior player," Patterson said. "Everyone else is learning their way."

Who better to learn the game from than Longhorn Coach Jody Conradt, in her 32nd year at Texas and someone Patterson referred to as "one of the grand dames of the game?"

"She does a tremendous job," Patterson said. "She's a coach I looked up to in high school. It'd be great to go down there and beat them to show them how the young guys can get it done."

Getting it done in the Erwin Center will be a difficult task for the Cats. The Longhorns are 5-1 at home in the conference, with the loss coming to nationally ranked Texas Tech. Overall, the Longhorns are 10-6 at home and coming off a 79-66 win over Texas A&M on Saturday.

"They're playing considerably better ball than at the beginning of the season," Patterson said. "But I expected that."

After a season-opening win Nov. 19 vs. North Texas, the Longhorns dropped four straight games. The Cats have dropped their past four games, losing the last three by a total of nine points.

The close losses hurt a little less when the Cats perform well, like they did in the 65-62 defeat at Kansas Saturday, Patterson said.

"That was a game we played real well in," she said. "If we take the floor being the team we were vs. Kansas and make a couple of improvements on our execution, we can win these games."

U.S., Britain reject proposal despite Iraqi compromise

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAIRO, Egypt — Baghdad is ready to open eight vast presidential complexes to inspection for a limited time, Iraq's foreign minister said Wednesday. The United States and Britain quickly rejected the proposal, which was similar to one made earlier by Iraq.

Inspectors appointed by the U.N. secretary-general would have two months to "search the sites, inch by inch, inside the buildings, the gardens ... everywhere," Foreign Minister Mohammed Saeed al-Sahhaf said.

Bill Richardson, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said Washington opposes any such compromise. "We feel very strongly there should be clear, unfettered access to all sites by U.N. inspectors," he said in New York.

Even as Iraq offered a compromise, Iraq's Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz said in a CNN interview that the standoff with the U.N. inspectors "might lead to a war."

Given the political impasse with the United States and Britain and the military buildup in the Persian Gulf, Aziz said the matter was serious enough for U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan to send his own hand-picked experts to make the inspections.

Washington objects to a time constraint and insists the team should comprise the same U.N. inspectors working since 1991 to dismantle Iraqi programs to build weapons of mass destruction — rather than Annan's representatives.

Aziz said Iraq is not to blame for the deadlock with the U.N. inspectors, who work under the U.N. Special Commission, or UNSCOM.

"We do not want this body, which was the cause of the crisis, to be the judge," Aziz said. "UNSCOM is the adversary in this matter; it should not be the judge."

Asked if Iraq would attack Israel or Kuwait, Aziz said: "We don't have any intention to strike except against the aggressor and inside our territory."

The United States threatens to use military force if Iraq refuses to comply with the U.N. inspectors. To bolster that threat, the United States has increased its military presence in the Persian Gulf region. Some 25,000 troops are deployed there now, said Navy Capt. Michael Doubleday, a Pentagon spokesperson.

Al-Sahhaf's visit to Cairo to meet with President Hosni Mubarak was part of a concerted effort by Saddam Hussein's envoys to persuade Arab neighbors to press for a compromise over the inspections. Hussein's envoys were seeking — and mostly getting — Arab backing to stop any attack by the United States.

"When we say eight we are actually saying all the sites in Iraq," al-Sahhaf said. He said each site contained several buildings. He did not clarify his statement.

U.N. officials list up to 63 sites where Iraq has barred or stopped arms inspections. The inspectors must certify that Iraq has eliminated its weapons of mass destruction before trade sanctions imposed after Iraq's 1990 invasion of Kuwait can be lifted.

The eight sites referred to in the earlier Iraqi proposal represented only a small fraction of Hussein's palaces. Only Hussein's inner circle knows how many exist.

Dozens have been built for the president and his family, many after the Persian Gulf War.

Speaking after talks with Mubarak, al-Sahhaf said much of the latest proposal, brokered by France and Russia, was based on Iraqi ideas.

Iraq is "doing everything to make sure political and diplomatic efforts succeed in averting a military clash," al-Sahhaf said.

Meanwhile in London, British Prime Minister Tony Blair turned aside a taunt from a legislator in his Labor Party that he was "following slavishly instructions from Washington."

"Saddam Hussein has been developing weapons of mass destruction ... he should not be in any doubt, and neither should anybody else, that if we are forced to take military action to bring him back into compliance (with the United Nations) we will do so," Blair said.

Injured bobcat rehabilitated, released near Fort Riley

A rumbling growl resonated from an animal carrier. Two glowing eyes glared back from a tuft of tan and black fur from within the cage.

Those eyes belonged to the formidable icon of K-State spirit: a wildcat, or more precisely, a bobcat.

Dr. James W. Carpenter, head of the Exotic Animal, Wildlife and Zoo Medicine Service of the College of Veterinary Medicine, was amused by the bobcat's behavior.

"We have become quite attached to him, but Willie is not very attached to us and would like to leave pretty soon," he said.

Willie the bobcat was brought in to the animal clinic with an injured leg only two days before the K-State Wildcats played in the 1997 Tostitos Fiesta Bowl.

Carpenter said everyone at the clinic became fond of the bobcat and named him in honor of the football team's victory.

About 25 miles west of Manhattan near Fort Riley, the injured male bobcat was found Dec. 29 by people whom staff at the animal clinic refer to as good Samaritans.

The wounded animal was captured and transported by the military police to the Exotic Animal, Wildlife and Zoo Medicine Service of the Veterinary Medical Sciences building.

"He was found in the road, probably hit by a car. We anesthetized him and took some radiographs," Carpenter said.

The initial radiographs, or X-rays, showed a fracture near the elbow in the upper part of Willie's right ulna, a bone in the lower foreleg.

Carpenter said that since the bobcat was in stable condition and already anesthetized, they decided to operate immediately. One of the doctors who examined the bobcat was intern Dr. Nancy Morales.

"In this case, it was a repairable problem. We had the space and were granted permission to do (the procedure)," she said.

The surgery was led by Dr. James K. Roush, associate professor of small animal orthopedics and section head of surgery. Dr. Jeffrey Geels, resident of small animal surgery, operated on the bobcat's limb.

"I have never operated on a bobcat before. It went very well. We were very happy with the post-operative X-rays," Geels said.

The procedure took about one and a half hours, he said.

Since the surgery about six weeks ago, Willie has been recovering in a pen in the animal clinic. Geels said the usual procedure is to physically rehabilitate the animals, but in this case the safety of the doctors and students must be considered as well.

"He hisses at us every time he sees us," Geels said. "It is hard to monitor his progress, but we are monitoring it as best we can. Because he's a wild animal, we can't put him through physical therapy."

Willie was fed a carnivore diet and eventually worked his way up to dining on mice to get him reaccustomed to feeding in the wild, Carpenter said.

Willie's release back into the wilderness was scheduled for about six weeks post-surgery. Carpenter said he felt that the bobcat was alert enough to be released.

"At first he was quite scared of us but he gradually became less scared. Now he's quite aggressive," Carpenter said.

"It's a good sign he's acting that way."

Professor defines architectural beauty in lecture series

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

In many ways architect Kenneth Frampton's lecture Wednesday was a complex undertaking for both him and the audience, yet it eloquently delivered on one of its most brilliant objectives.

Frampton relishes the fundamental elements of building.

Call it architecture, call it a masterpiece, but Frampton can stylishly pare down a building verbally to its most basic forms and innovations while taking sheer delight in its reliance on centuries-old traditions.

The Ware Professor of Architecture at Columbia University, Frampton spoke to more than 200 architecture students as part of the spring Oscar Ekdahl Memorial Lecture series in Union Forum Hall about the "Scope of Tectonics."

The body of the lecture was based on his 1995 book, "Studies in Tectonic Culture: The Poetics of Construction in Nineteenth and Twentieth Century Architecture."

For those unfamiliar with his work, it's an ambiguous title, particularly the word tectonic. As Frampton began, he said tectonic is generally a geological term. He said he uses it the way 19th-century German philosophers did, referring to the built fabric of architecture (tectonic meaning the "art of joining").

Frampton interprets architecture not as the displacement of space or the creation of an image, but by looking at a structure, particularly the joints. He finds connective tissue, as it were, between various forms of a building — the roof work, walls and earth-work or foundation.

"The joint itself is the expressive thing in itself," he said.

Frampton often quoted the 19th-century German philosopher Gottfried Semper, who connected the cloth knots found in clothing to the tents of North African nomadic tribes.

Memory of BSU student to be honored at ball

JOHN STOUS
Kansas State Collegian

The Second Annual Stacey Hall Scholarship Fund Ball will bring dancers Saturday night to Union Station. The ball, sponsored by Black Student Union, is in memory of former K-State student Stacey Hall.

The semi-formal ball starts at 10 p.m. Saturday in Union Station, which is on the ground floor of the K-State Student Union. Admission is $4 per person.

"We should have a pretty good turnout," said Colette McLemore, senior in social sciences and president of Black Student Union. "We will probably have some people come over to the ball after the Jazz Festival. We want to get things started once that is over."

All proceeds will go into the Stacey Hall Humanitarian Award, which is sponsored by BSU. The award is scholarship money and a framed certificate.

The amount of money for the scholarship depends on the amount collected at the ball.

Hall was an active student at K-State and was the recording secretary for BSU in fall 1996. In November 1996, Hall died of injuries sustained in an automobile accident.

"Stacey was a great person and did a lot for BSU," McLemore said. "This is just a good way to keep her spirit alive."

Hall was a junior in social work. She worked for the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department as a preschool teacher and also worked at a shelter for young boys.

The Stacey Hall Humanitarian Award is offered to all K-State students who are involved in community service, are concerned with human values and achievement, demonstrate leadership and have diversity awareness.

Reno requests independent prosecutor to investigate American Indian casino

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Attorney General Janet Reno asked for an independent prosecutor Wednesday to investigate whether Interior Secretary Bruce Babbitt misled Congress in connection with an American Indian casino controversy.

If a special court complies with Reno's request, it would be the first such prosecutor to be named in connection with the wide-ranging inquiries in Congress over campaign fund raising and political influence during the 1996 election.

Republicans say contributions to the Democrats might have played a role in Babbitt's decision in 1995 to reject a proposal from a group of Wisconsin American Indians for a casino. Rival American Indians who later contributed money to the Democratic Party opposed the casino — as did the local community.

But Reno made clear in her request that the special prosecutor should limit the investigation to Babbitt's testimony on the casino issue, and not delve into broader campaign finance matters.

Babbitt said he was disappointed with the decision. "If it's true that only an independent counsel can resolve a matter like this ... then I think the list of hidden costs one has to pay for public service has just grown a little longer," Babbitt said in a statement.

President Clinton expressed confidence that Babbitt would be cleared.

"I have known Bruce Babbitt for many years. He is a man of the highest integrity and dedicated public servant. I am convinced that when this matter is concluded he will be vindicated," Clinton said. "I look forward to his continuing service to the American people."

But Reno said in her request that there were reasonable grounds for further investigation by an outside prosecutor on whether Babbitt might have been untruthful to a Senate committee last October in connection with the casino decision.

Clinton proposes minimum wage boost; GOP wants revenue to go toward tax cuts

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton is preparing to embrace a $1 an hour increase in the minimum wage as part of a legislative agenda he and congressional Democratic leaders are about to unveil, congressional aides said Wednesday.

Final details were still being hammered out, said House and Senate aides, speaking on condition of anonymity. They said Democratic leaders and Clinton were ready to endorse raising the current $5.15 hourly minimum wage in two 50-cent increments, probably over the next two or three years.

House Republican leaders, meanwhile, returned from a three-day GOP retreat saying they would rather use the $100 billion Clinton wants for new domestic initiatives over the next five years for tax cuts.

"We're pretty confident about the way that choice comes out" with the voters, House Speaker Newt Gingrich, R-Ga., told reporters.

Both parties' plans pointed to some of the highest profile battles that lay ahead in this congressional election year. Even if they are not able to prevail with legislation that becomes law, Democrats believe that pushing for a minimum wage boost — and Republicans think a campaign to cut spending — plays well with their voters.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., and other liberals last month proposed raising the minimum wage by $1.50 to $6.65 an hour by September 2000 and indexing it to inflation thereafter. Clinton endorsed raising the minimum wage in his State of the Union message last month, but did not specify how much.

His proposal would keep the White House behind an issue that Democrats believe they can use effectively in next November's election, when the entire House and one-third of the Senate face re-election.

Republicans oppose any minimum wage increase, arguing it would raise business costs and cause unemployment. But they also opposed the last one for much of 1996 before succumbing to a Democratic drive that boosted the wage floor by 90 cents — the first increase in six years.

Referendum repeals gay, lesbian rights law; vote receives 51 percent of Maine electorate

AUGUSTA, Maine — Maine became the first state to vote to repeal a gay rights law, a move both sides said should send a message around the nation.

Tuesday's referendum brought out 31 percent of Maine's registered voters, well above the 25 percent state officials had predicted for a midwinter special election.

With 96 percent of precincts reporting, 137,903 votes, or 51 percent, favored repeal, to 129,925 votes, or 49 percent, for retaining the gay-rights law.

"Certainly, the right will feel emboldened by this, but again, I think it will definitely be a wake-up call across the country for the gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender community," said Rebecca Isaacs, political director for the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force.

She and other gay rights supporters said the repeal would increase pressure for a federal law. Opponents said the federal government should learn a different lesson: Stay away from special protections for homosexuals.

Ten other states and Washington, D.C., now have laws similar to Maine's, which would have barred discrimination against gays and lesbians in employment, housing, public accommodations and credit. The states are California, Connecticut, Hawaii, Massachusetts, Minnesota, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Rhode Island, Vermont and Wisconsin.

"I think you're going to continue to see these issues pop up across the country because it seems a defining issue for liberalism going into the 21st century is granting special rights based on one's sexual preferences behind closed doors," said Randy Tate, executive director of the Christian Coalition.

His group helped fund the repeal effort.

Marijuana controversy may perpetuate stereotype of snowboarders in Olympics

NAGANO, Japan — OK, was anybody really surprised when a snowboarder was stripped of his gold medal because marijuana was found in his system?

The people who put together the 1998 Winter Olympics should have expected something — anything — in allowing snowboarding to become a medal sport. It would have been hard to miss the brash, counterculture attitude of this rock 'n' roll, Generation X sport.

"If you were going to predict anything happening at the Olympics with a recreational drug, this is the sport you'd predict it in," said Art Taylor, director of youth sports at Northeastern University's Center for the Study of Sport in Society.

"Maybe," he said, "it moved into the Olympics too quickly."

Few wanted snowboarding in the Olympics more than Ross Rebagliati, 26, a spirited Canadian with tousled blond hair, angled jaw and carefree grin — a surfer dude straight out of central casting. He won the first-ever Olympic snowboarding gold Sunday in the men's giant slalom.

Today, he finds himself at the center of the first significant controversy since the games began. Not only was marijuana residue found in his urine, but he faces the added humiliation of being sanctioned for a drug few would consider performance-enhancing.

"This will undoubtedly be tough for the sport," said Carol Anne Letheren, head of Canada's Olympic association.

Rebagliati maintains that the 17.8 nanograms per milliliter of marijuana in his system came from secondhand smoke at a going-away party last month in Canada, and that he hasn't smoked pot since last April.

"The public sort of looks at this and thinks, 'Ah — snowboarders are all wild and crazy,'" said Rob Roy, a coach for the U.S. snowboarding team. "That's not good."

Discount office supplier to open first Midwest store in region

GLYN STRICKLAND, JUNCTION CITY, STORE IS NEXT TO WAL-MART.

An office supply store should be open by next week on Manhattan's east side.

General Manager Charlie Hayes said Staples, located north of Wal-Mart in the 600 block of Tuttle Creek Boulevard, should be open by Feb. 19.

Hayes said the store won't be heavily advertised or promoted until a week after its projected opening date. He said the opening date is tentative due to logistical problems at the store.

"Right now we are missing some fixtures, and it's slowing us down," he said.

Hayes said a preview party for Manhattan Chamber of Commerce members is set for Feb. 26. A grand opening sale is planned for 9 a.m. to 1 p.m. Feb. 28.

"I'm excited by the response from the community," Hayes said. "I think we will do well here and are glad to be a part of the community."

The Manhattan location was chosen as the first store in Kansas for the office supply chain. Staples, which began in 1986, has about 700 stores located on the east and west coasts. Hayes said Staples is concentrating on expansion in the Midwest.

"Staples tends to look for communities where there is not much competition such as Office Max and Office Depot," Hayes said.

The new store employs about 30 people and is geared toward small businesses and companies, teachers, students and home businesses, he said.

The company is also geared toward its employees, Hayes said.

"You couldn't ask for a better company," he said. "They treat their employees with respect."

Ann Harts, economic development director and vice president of the Chamber of Commerce, said chamber members are always happy to welcome new industries and retail businesses.

"We look forward to having Staples as a community partner," Harts said.

Staples' operating hours will be 7 a.m. to 9 p.m. Monday through Friday, 9 a.m. to 9 p.m. Saturday and 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. Sunday.

Board makes decision without implementing all recommendations

JOHN HENDERSON
Kansas State Collegian

After the Board of Student Publications voted to vacate Director Ron Johnson's position last week, board members and others have called for new bylaws and changes in the board's structure.

But in 1996, the board ignored recommendations by journalism professionals on how to do just that.

In fall 1996, a committee of five editors, publishers and employees of Kansas newspapers were invited by the board for advice on how best to restructure the board.

Johnson said the board had intended to assert more day-to-day control over the company's operations at the time.

"The tension that arose from that prompted the board to invite an advisory group to visit and learn more about our operation, and to make recommendations on how to improve," he said.

The list of recommendations, dated Sept. 26, 1996, includes one that would make journalism students and faculty a majority of the board's membership.

The committee also recommended that a committee of A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications faculty hire editors for the Collegian and Royal Purple yearbook. The board now makes those hiring decisions.

The proposal also suggested funding Student Publications Inc.'s computers and equipment as part of the journalism school's budget, because the student publications serve as learning tools for journalism students.

Patrick Carney, chairman of the board at the time, said the board responded to the recommendations by increasing communication with the staff of the newspaper and yearbook. He said the board also allowed a representative from each of the newspaper, yearbook and advertising staffs to be elected to the board, instead of one representing all three.

Beyond that, Carney said the recommendations were generally unworkable. "We took from them what we would," he said, "and every idea we took passed. The ones that didn't have gone by the wayside."

Carney said the advisory committee didn't include anyone from outside the journalism field. He added that students from all majors should be adequately represented by at-large board members because 30 percent of Student Publications' budget is funded by student fees.

He said having a majority of journalism students or faculty on the board would go against the democratic process of representative government. Carney said granting journalism faculty and students a majority would represent an academic theocracy.

"We're not talking about control or content control issues," he said. "It just wasn't workable, considering the position the board wanted to take at the time."

Howard Kessinger, editor and co-publisher of the Marysville Advocate and a member of the committee, had a different idea. He said he thought the board didn't listen to the recommendations.

"I just don't think they paid any attention to it," he said.

Kessinger, a former member of the Collegian advertising staff, said the student publications program at the University of Kansas seemed like a workable model.

Tom Eblen, news adviser for the University Daily Kansan, KU's newspaper, said its board consists of three students — the editor, business manager (equivalent to the Collegian advertising manager) and a Student Senate representative — and three journalism faculty.

But Eblen said the Kansan receives about 5 percent of its revenue from student fees, a much smaller proportion than K-State's.

Johnson said he isn't in favor of any source of funds that might create a conflict of interest.

While it might be argued that the Collegian is a laboratory for courses offered by the journalism school, Johnson said he isn't in favor of giving the school too much control.

"That implies content is under the jurisdiction of the school and its faculty," he said. "That should not be one of our goals."

Johnson said he views the $374,700 in student fees this fiscal year as the price students pay for having a free student newspaper.

"I just hope that whatever happens, it becomes a neutral allocation where the source doesn't try to take advantage of the funding," he said.

Bruce Buchanan, vice president of Harris Enterprises, which publishes seven newspapers in Kansas, said it makes sense for the board to have some control over content. He said that idea is best served by allowing the board to hire the editor in chief.

As a member of the advisory committee, Buchanan said allowing students in short-term positions on the board to make long-term changes to the operation hurts the credibility of the publications.

Buchanan said he was disappointed by the board's treatment of the advisory committee's recommendations.

Valentine's Day not about candy, expensive gifts

Saturday is the annual day of hearts, flowers and mushiness also known as Valentine's Day. Although a fair number of people might feel that this day has become one big greeting card company promotion (you know the name), it is also an excellent chance to make those around you feel good. Just because you are not romantically linked with anyone, or even if you are, there is no reason not to let certain people know they are close to your heart. Give them a little trinket, a chocolate sucker or a new penny. Buy a box of valentines like the ones you used to give in grade school and hand them out. Remember the less obvious people. Valentine's Day is meant to celebrate love in all its meanings. Call your parents. They were the first people you ever loved, and sometimes, they like to be reminded. Surprise your sibling with a cheesy valentine. Grandparents also love to be remembered on days like this. Valentine's Day is a day that is set aside to share your warm feelings. So go on, share them. Tell your favorite professors you really enjoy their classes and wish them a happy Valentine's Day. If you know someone who might be prone to bitterness this weekend, pass on a candy heart. The hearts have been updated for the '90s. The new ones suggest faxing and e-mailing. If you are romantically involved, be creative. Taking your special someone out to dinner on the busiest eating-out night of the year isn't nearly as sweet as cooking for each other.

Take a stroll on Lover's Lane. When else will you be living in a town that actually has a Lover's Lane? Be sweet. Be thoughtful. Be the date you always wanted to have. If you are single, get a bunch of single people together and rent "The Dirty Dozen." It's not romantic in any way and stars Telly Savalas. How anti-Valentine can you get? Even though Valentine's Day has that taint of commercialism, there is no reason to give in to it. Rise above the hype and have an old-fashioned Valentine's Day.

Wintertime blues

Winter Olympics leave columnist unsatisfied, annoyed

What event rolls around every four years and leaves one unsatisfied?

One can't be blamed for guessing presidential elections, but in this case I was referring to the Winter Olympics. Not that the Summer Olympics are much different from the Winter Olympics in most regards, but given my snow-sport challenged background, and the fact that it's the Winter Olympics that are currently annoying me, I'm inclined to view the Summer Olympics slightly more favorably.

VIEWPOINT
PAUL ROBBER
Paul is a senior in chemistry and biochemistry. You can send e-mail to Paul at vlad@ksu.edu.

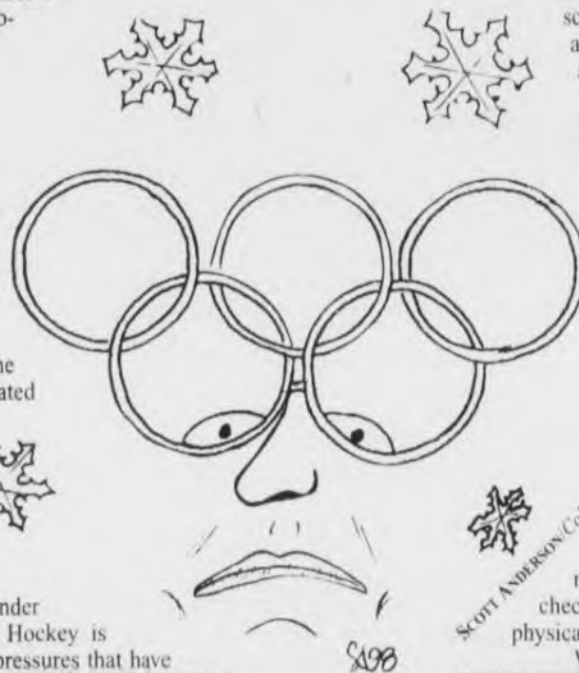

I'm annoyed by so many different factors it's really difficult to decide where to begin. On an early conciliatory note for those who are enthralled by the Olympic games, I must admit that I was impressed by the appearance of Akebono, a giant in the world of sumo wrestling, in the Opening Ceremonies. Olympic officials might have expressed worries about getting enough snow in Nagano, but that doesn't mean it's very warm over there, especially for someone wearing a glorified jockstrap.

The list of factors that contribute to my general annoyance is easily perused if presented in a sport-by-sport format. Why not start with figure skating? Although broadcasters have recently begun to capitalize on the sport of figure skating, it still stands as a sport whose main audience is mostly composed of fair-weather friends.

Few of those who find themselves glued to the tube right now, memorizing the minutiae of Tara Lipinsky's life, knew anything about her sport last week, or will even care in August.

With many of these fans, the vicarious thrill they receive when their competitor triumphs reminds one of the fans of a certain football team located one state north of here, and that's always a scary thought.

Moving to the next sport: hockey. While the men's roster for the American team is now loaded with NHL talent, one must wonder about the meaning of amateur. Hockey is simply succumbing to the same pressures that have shaped the path of many other sports, but why? Wasn't a team of American amateurs good enough to win the gold in 1980 at Lake Placid, N.Y.? While foreign countries might receive a degree of guilty pleasure by using semi-professional and professional players to field a team of ringers, the fact that the collective American consciousness doesn't allow us to accept a best effort by a team of amateurs says a lot.

SCOTT HOPPER
Scott is a junior in psychology. You can send e-mail to Scott at hoppe@ksu.edu.

The introduction of women's ice hockey adds an additional measure of gender equity to the games, but the vocabulary surrounding its introduction hardly smacks of equity. Many sources have labeled women's ice hockey as a purer form of the sport. They insist that women place more emphasis on fundamentals and finesse, compared to their male counterparts whose play is checkered with body checks and physical contact.

Which portion of the spectrum, though, represents pure hockey? Who hasn't heard the, "Last night I went to the fights and a hockey game broke out" joke? Traditionally hockey has been a physical sport. Besides, even in men's hockey, North American teams tend to play more physically than European teams, so who decided which style of play is dirty or distorted?

Sadly enough, while the introduction of women's hockey does represent an initiative to ensure equal access to both sexes, the addition of several new sports makes one wonder if Generation X isn't considered an under-represented minority. Snowboarding is a sport? Freestyle skiing is a sport?

They both require skill and coordination, but does anyone else think it's slightly fishy that both have ascended to the status of Olympic sport in such a short time following their inception?

Curling is centuries old, and only now has it been elevated to the status of Olympic sport. (And curling, like bowling, even passes the beer test: I could drink a beer while curling, but doubt I could snowboard even when sober.) Why the rush to include snowboarding?

I'll go out on a limb and guess that the Olympic committee's decision was made much easier by the enormous sums of money associated with sports that are well-received in the American TV market.

Since the American TV market is simply so much larger in number and devotion than most countries, the American broadcast rights can be expected to demand a higher price than the broadcast rights for many other markets. Knowing this, the Olympic Organizing Committee doesn't seem afraid to risk the aura of the Olympic games in exchange for the opportunity to exploit the situation.

When one puts all these factors together, it makes me wonder what is funnier: the fact that a member of the American men's bobsled team is a professional wrestler? Or the fact that a bunch of snow monkeys can grab the national spotlight away from tensions in Iraq?

True heroes think of others before thinking of themselves

In the course of the past six months or so, several so-called heroes and role models have been in the news.

President Clinton found himself in the middle of sex scandals.

Princess Diana's tragic death stunned the world. And good ol' Michael Jordan was busy being Michael Jordan, winning his fifth NBA championship.

VIEWPOINT
SAM FELSENFELD
Sam is a senior in print journalism. You can send e-mail to Sam at self701@ksu.edu.

But these people, while visible in the public eye, are not really heroes — they're mistaken as heroes. In reality, they're just famous. I'll tell you about a hero, though.

He doesn't have a jump shot or a curveball or a billion dollars. He's just a hero. He can't make a good bounce pass, but he sure can do the right thing. He always has. He always will. Not to impress anybody or to be politically correct or to make money, though. He does what's right for the sake of what's right.

He served his country during the Vietnam War. He tells the truth. He's friendly to strangers. He's never hit a home run, though. He's worked hard to support his family since he was in grade school. He's had years where he spent 40 hours at work every week, came home to put 30 hours into his business, gave 20 volunteer hours serving as the treasurer of his temple, yet still made time for his family.

He's never been able to donate $1 million out of a Nike contract to set up a charitable foundation, but he's always been concerned for those less fortunate than he is.

He's never had a garage sale because he'd rather donate excess goods to the needy. He was unemployed at one point and lived off his life savings, but he still budgeted money to give to charity.

He's very intelligent. He graduated from college and passed the certified public accountant exam when he was only 19 years old. Later, he went to law school at night and passed the bar exam, and he still found time to work, take care of his wife and play with his two toddler sons.

He's saved more than 100 lives. That's how many times he's given blood to the American Red Cross. He likes to go in about every three weeks or so. He's disappointed when he gets a cold, because they won't let him donate. Once, he was upset because he was in line to donate bone marrow, but he wasn't a close enough match.

He knows the value of an education, so he started putting money away for his two sons to go to college the month his first child was born. He put his retirement off a good five to 10 years by fully funding his two sons' combined 10 1/2 years of college.

He'll never kick a field goal, but he'll never kick an animal, either. He's never hunted and plans his vacation around his dog. If he's out of town on business, he calls his wife. He also checks up on the dog.

He doesn't drink or smoke, and he sure doesn't touch any kind of drug besides his legally prescribed blood-pressure medication. Last weekend, at his niece's wedding, he drank a virgin Diet Coke on the rocks during cocktail hour. He's a little ashamed to admit that he once smoked a cigar when he was in the U.S. Army.

He taught his kids how to read using alphabet soup. He once drove two hours into the California desert after he got off work to watch his son's T-ball game.

He's had his share of bad luck, although he doesn't gamble. Actually, he spends a couple dollars on five-cent slots when he goes to visit his son in Las Vegas. He can afford it, though.

He was divorced twice by the time he was 40, but he kept his faith in humans. He married the woman who is his perfect match when he was 44.

Once, when his son broke his neck, he moved everything from his office into his son's hospital room so he could spend more time with him.

That same week, when his 16-year-old son was learning how to walk again and threw up all over him, he got upset.

Not because of his ruined shirt, but because his son was in pain. He can afford to live a flashy lifestyle, but he's happier keeping things simple and relaxed.

He'll give you his last piece of pizza if you really want it. He has good morals.

He doesn't cheat on his wife. He taught his sons to refrain from violence, not to steal and to respect women.

He was the official scorer for his sons' Little League teams. He never yelled at an umpire or second-guessed a coach. He stressed sportsmanship, not technique.

He once got off work because his son really wanted him to watch his football game at 3 p.m. on a Thursday afternoon.

He talks to his neighbors. He respects his mother. He calls her, too. He's never called a police officer a pig.

He doesn't judge people by their race, religion or sexual preference.

He has bad eyesight, but he has a great sense of humor. He never scored a game-winning touchdown, but he's what's right with America.

He's a hero.
He's my dad.
He turns 50 on Saturday.
Happy birthday, Dad.
Thanks for being a hero.

U.S. invasion of Iraq could mark beginning of WWII; make upcoming Valentine's Day something special

Buy her flowers. Take him to dinner for a change. Send your high school sweetheart a card. Take advantage of this St. Valentine's Day, because although this day comes once a year and you may get another chance, for some of us it will be our last.

I have accepted the fact that I am going to war. Downsizing of the military, increased military involvement around the world, the complexity of the mission against Iraq and the non-unity of the international community are the main events that led to this conclusion. America, mighty as it thinks it is, will have a tough time mustering the forces for a land war in Iraq. They will need many reserve units.

Since he took office, President Clinton has downsized the military considerably. Yet America continues to commit large amounts of troops around the world. The active components, while fighting budget cuts, are overextending themselves to keep an impressive contingent in areas like Korea and the Middle East. The simple fact remains, we just don't have the troops we had in 1991.

To fight any type of conflict, a large amount of reserve units are going to be needed. To illustrate this point, remember how many reserve units were needed to fight in '91? Our army was at full strength then.

The primary mission is to destroy Iraq's capability to manufacture weapons of mass destruction. We could do this with air power, but who says we won't have to come back in a couple years to do it again? As it is, this has been an ongoing conflict since '91. The real mission is to oust the dictatorship. To do that requires a huge commitment of units to the area. It requires a land war.

The build-up you see now is just the beginning. Many more soldiers will soon be on their way to the Middle East. Mark my words.

A more troubling turn of events is the non-unity of the international coalition. Britain has committed troops, but they have always backed the United States. They seem like that little dog urging the United States to go forward, "Come on, Spike." Canada and Australia recently have backed the United States, but with no real troops. They don't want to fight, just watch from the sidelines. The bulk of this burden falls on the United States, as it always has.

When Russian President Boris Yeltsin warns this could erupt into World War III, we should listen. Easily it could. China, with the world's largest army, opposes an attack on Iraq. North Korea, enduring severe economic hardship, runs with China. Both are not on good terms with the United States. It would be an opportune time to invade South Korea if a war erupted in the Middle East.

I am not against controlling Saddam Hussein. I think a military deterrent against Iraq might be necessary. However, if we are going to be involved in conflicts around the world, we should stop downsizing the military. Give our troops the money and means to fight.

On this Valentine's Day, treat your loved ones right. In the coming months, many will leave for the Middle East. As with any conflict, some will not come home.

Collegian news coverage questioned by reader

Editor,
Chris Dean wrote on Monday about how hard the Collegian is trying not to be biased in its coverage of the dismissal of Ron Johnson.

Bias comes not only in the words a newspaper chooses to print, but also in what a newspaper chooses to print and how it is printed.

In the latter two cases, the Collegian has shown bias in the extreme.

As if the well-being of the campus community is dependent upon whether Ron Johnson is dismissed, the Collegian has dedicated quite a few days and lots of front page space to this event.

In addition, the newspaper has printed an extraordinary number of letters to the editor about the Ron Johnson affair. Wednesday's newspaper even had a front page story about how many people wrote in support of Ron Johnson.

Since I arrived at K-State, I've heard of many similar stories of people's jobs on the line, which had equal or greater importance than that of Ron Johnson's, yet these stories got little or no press coverage. I guess if it involves departments outside of journalism, then it is not worth writing about. I get the impression the members of the Collegian staff think that Kedzie Hall is at the center of the universe and that all other matter and energy revolves around them.

Veterinarians release bobcat

Plans were made to release Willie on Wednesday near the site where he was found. But before returning Willie into his natural habitat, he was anesthetized and more X-rays were taken to ensure that his leg had healed properly.

Geels said he thought the young bobcat was ready for liberation.

"The joint surface was well aligned," he said. "It's not 100-percent healed but we feel comfortable it will go ahead and heal."

Roush said he agreed, adding that the elbow felt smooth. After some final X-rays, Willie was released Wednesday afternoon.

Morales was pleased with the recovery of this particular patient. She that not all wild animal surgeries have such a positive outcome.

"This was one of the happy endings. The best part of the wildlife program is when you can do something like this," she said.

Speaker compares building forms, styles

Frampton took this another step, comparing this reliance on the basic knot as the basis for structural connections even in contemporary architecture or in the interwoven masonry buildings of Frank Lloyd Wright, who Frampton said, referred to himself as a weaver.

In Frampton's view, buildings can be a subtle balance of heavy and light-weight forms — the way a heavy concrete foundation ties to the ground and a light wood roof floats skyward.

Throughout his lecture, Frampton repeatedly illustrated how building techniques only subtly change throughout history.

He found ways of connecting the elaborate stonework columns and arches supporting vaults in a Gothic cathedral to the elegant iron work found in late 19th-century buildings.

He compared the core form, or main structural elements of a building, to the art form, or applied surface detail. The classic example for Frampton is the Greek Ionic fluted column, a rather abstract structure of cylinders given meaning with fluting, which reinforces its structural nature.

Among his many positions and honors, Frampton has taught at Princeton University and was awarded a Guggenheim Fellowship in 1975. Although he has written extensively in periodicals, he's published books such as "Modern Architecture: A Critical History" and 1995's "American Masterworks."

Frampton reserved much of his criticism for the recent wave of media about the effects of the Internet and mass culture on architecture.

"Images and media dominate the world stage," Frampton said. "We are increasingly bombarded by images. There has been this marked tendency to reduce architecture to nothing but images."

Frampton said humans see in corporeal metaphors.

"Architecture is not just experienced optically, but by the body and tactile senses as much as it is by the eyes," Frampton said.

Frampton's way of thinking and connecting, not just seeing, makes for the least superficial of architectural theory. He does not merely utilize past theorists for reinforcing his own selective views, but expounds on arguments that date to antiquity in both rationale and appropriateness.

"I HOPE FIVE TO 10 YEARS FROM NOW, IF I'M STILL ABLE TO PLAY GOLF, THE PGA TOUR WILL LEAN BACK AND SCRATCH THEIR HEADS AND SAY, 'WHY DID WE FIGHT THIS GUY?'"

CASEY MARTIN, who won a lawsuit Wednesday allowing him to play on the PGA Tour with the assistance of a golf cart

Federal judge rules in golfer's favor; player is allowed to use golf cart

EUGENE, Ore. — A judge ruled Wednesday that Casey Martin can ride a golf cart on the PGA Tour, a landmark victory in the first case invoking federal disabilities laws to compete in a professional sport.

When U.S. Magistrate Thomas Coffin announced his ruling, Martin smiled slightly, nodded his head while looking at his parents, then turned to his lawyers and said: "We won."

Coffin ruled that a golf course during a tournament is a place of public accommodation under the federal Americans With Disabilities Act.

He said Martin's lawyers proved the 25-year-old golfer is disabled and entitled to a reasonable accommodation — which would include a cart.

Martin's lawsuit sought to force the PGA Tour to accommodate his rare circulatory disorder that makes it painful and even dangerous to walk. His doctors say too much stress on his withered right leg could cause it to break, and might force amputation.

Coffin said the PGA Tour had failed to meet the burden of proof on its contention that allowing Martin to ride a cart would fundamentally alter the sport.

Tour officials contended giving Martin a cart would not only give him an unfair advantage, but also would take away the fundamental aspect of athleticism and stamina that walking brings to top-flight tournament golf.

Kansas basketball recruit taking 2nd look at offer from UCLA Bruins

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — High school basketball star JoRon Rush of Kansas City's Pembroke Hill is having second thoughts about going to the University of Kansas.

Rush said in November that he wanted to sign with the Jayhawks during the early signing period, but held off at his mother's request.

Now, however, he's reconsidering the situation, and is in more frequent contact with UCLA than Kansas.

Rush indicates concern about playing time at Kansas because Coach Roy Williams tends to substitute freely. He thinks he'd get less time as a freshman if Kansas star Paul Pierce returns for his senior year.

"Roy substitutes too much for me, but I still might want to go there," Rush said Tuesday night. "I really don't know what I'm going to do. I haven't talked to him (Williams) lately, and I talk to UCLA about every two weeks."

"I'll probably just make a decision when it's time to sign."

HELLO, DAHLIE

Bjorn Dahlie of Norway won a record sixth gold medal in the men's 10-kilometer cross country race. No other man has won so many Winter Olympic titles.

WAITING FOR WORD ON DRUGS

Canadian snowboarder Ross Rebagliati waited to hear a decision on an appeal of a positive drug test for marijuana that stripped him of his giant slalom gold medal. It was the first drug case of the games.

WEATHER BLUES

The Olympics are wet again. Snow and sleet hit the mountains, with rain and high winds forecast for later. Rain was expected in Nagano, too, with a high of 48 degrees.

ALPINE SKIING

Picabo Street did it again, and one better this time. Street, the surprising silver medalist in downhill four years ago, got the gold this time in the women's super-G.

ICE HOCKEY

The United States beat Finland 4-2 to move one victory closer to a meeting of undefeated women's hockey teams with Canada. The Canadians won, too, 5-3 over Sweden.

LUGE

Silke Kraushaar beat German teammate Barbara Niedernhuber by two-thousandths of a second, the closest Olympic luge race ever. Erin Warren of Winchester, Mass., was sixth.

SKI JUMPING

Jani Soininen of Finland won the 90-meter ski jump before more than 65,000 fans, who were disappointed when favorite Masahiko Harada of Japan finished fifth.

SPEEDSKATING

Jennifer Rodriguez of Miami set an Olympic record in the women's 3,000 meters, but it wasn't enough for a medal. Rodriguez finished fourth, seeing her record topped three times, as Gunda Niemann-Stirnemann led a German medals sweep.

NAGANO NUGGET

The Olympics pride themselves as a showcase of the best, but the world's best snowboarder isn't here. Terje Haakonsen of Norway stayed away to protest the way the games are run.

QUOTEBOOK

"Rules are rules. You've got to follow them. It's very surprising to see an athlete busted for that." Figure skater Michelle Kwan, on the marijuana case of snowboarder Ross Rebagliati.

Like any good roller coaster, the Wildcats game vs. Texas had twists, turns and surprises. Coach Tom Asbury considered the Cats riding without a seat belt at times in the 83-79 victory.

"They're just dangerous," Asbury said. "We don't match up well with them. We were just lucky to get a win."

The Cats jumped out to a 10-3 lead early, a characteristic that appeared throughout the game. But the inside shooting of Longhorn center Chris Mihm combined with the perimeter shooting of guards Brandy Perryman and Luke Axtell provided problems at every turn.

"We'd get up 12 or 13 and then we'd let them get a couple of good looks," junior Cat center Shawn Rhodes said. "We'd just have a defensive breakdown."

The teams traded the lead until the Cats took a seven-point lead as they wrapped up the first half. But Mihm and Longhorn forward Kris Clack cut the lead to three at the top of the second half.

"As young as they are, it would have been good if we'd gotten them down 15 to 18 points," Asbury said. "But when they're only down eight to 12, the shooting of Axtell and Perryman lets them back in a little bit."

Axtell, who leads the Big 12 in three-point shooting percentage at 45 percent, was kept to one-of-three from behind the arc. Cat senior guard Aaron Swartzendruber had the difficult task of guarding the 6-foot-9-inch guard.

"We just tried to deny him the ball," Swartzendruber, who stands at 6 feet 1 inch, said. "When he's 6-9 and playing shooting guard, he can just shoot right over the top of you. He's got the green light to shoot, and it keeps them in the game."

Axtell was four-of-10 from the field, but a perfect four-of-four from the foul line, helping propel the Longhorns to their 83-percent free-throw shooting for the game. Three of six Longhorns were flawless from the charity stripe, and Clack was 13-of-15 from there.

Five of the 10 Cats who shot were perfect from the free-throw line, but Asbury said the Cats gained no advantage from this point.

"We shot the heck out of it," he said. "We shot free throws extremely well — 78 percent — but the problem is that they're 83 percent."

As the game wound down, four Longhorns were on the line in the last three minutes. Junior Cat forward Manny Dies fouled Clack on a last-minute three-point attempt, and Clack converted on two of the three shots.

Rhodes recorded his seventh double-double of the season with 13 points and 12 rebounds. Dies tipped in a game-high 25 points, most with his back to the basket and two defenders in his face.

"He's making big plays for us when we need them," Swartzendruber said. "He just keeps getting better and better as the season goes on."

Dies overpowers freshman, leads Cats to 83-79 win

JOEL WHITE

Kansas State Collegian

Power met finesse in Bramlage Coliseum on Wednesday night — and power won.

K-State forward Manny Dies muscled his way to 25 points and five rebounds while Texas center Chris Mihm exhibited a soft shooting touch in an 18-point, 10-rebound effort.

K-State coach Tom Asbury was reluctant to answer when asked if Dies, a junior, taught the freshman Mihm any lessons in K-State's 83-79 win.

"Probably, we could play them again in the tournament, so I certainly don't want to make a statement about what we did to who," Asbury said.

The Longhorns' size inside seemed to be no problem for Dies.

He played a powerful inside game, continuously posting up Mihm and breaking through double teams to pour in baskets. He made 10-of-15 from the field and five-of-five from the free-throw line.

"They've got so many big guys, they've got a 6-foot-9-inch guard on the help side, that creates a lot of trouble," Cat forward Shawn Rhodes said.

While Dies was powering his way to points, the 7-foot tall Mihm used a graceful touch and shot over the Cats.

Rhodes, who scored 13 points and grabbed 12 rebounds, took most of the blame for Mihm's offensive production.

"I was probably guarding Mihm more than Manny, and I don't feel like I did a good job on him," Rhodes said.

Although Dies' power was a key to the Cats' win, his aggressiveness almost did the Wildcats in. With 41 seconds remaining in the game and the Cats ahead 79-75, Dies fouled Texas forward Kris Clack on a three-point shot. Clack made two of the three ensuing foul shots, cutting the Cats' lead to two.

Asbury said he cannot blame Dies for going for the block.

"With Manny and with a couple of other guys that can block a shot, I can live with it," Asbury said.

"Some of Manny's other decisions were far more questionable than that."

Dies quickly redeemed himself.

With 20 seconds on the clock, Dies received a pass from Cat guard Chris Griffin and dunked it, giving the Cats a four-point lead.

Ten seconds later, Dies blocked Texas guard Bernard Smith's shot, and Cat guard Aaron Swartzendruber picked up the loose ball to seal the victory.

Athletic failure at Olympics needs to be kept in perspective

Failure sucks. It's a common bond you share with the person sitting next to you, that professor droning on, as well as athletes all over the world.

We've all failed. In a class, at work, in a personal relationship or in competition, failure is a daily occurrence.

When it hits, no one can convince you that you'll overcome it. Failure shrinks your world. You think, "Everybody knows I flunked algebra. Everyone knows I screwed up at work. Everyone knows my significant other broke up with me."

But apply this to Olympic athletics for a second.

Imagine that heart-wrenching, humiliating breakup scene. Now put it on television before a panel of judges and a CBS worldwide viewing audience of 2 billion people with Jim Nantz commenting.

NANTZ: "You told him how you felt. He stared blankly at you. How do you feel about the 5.7 the judges gave you in communication style?"

YOU: "Well, I thought my execution was right on. With him saying nothing, I felt I deserved a 6.0. But the result is the same — we'll still break up."

NANTZ: "It's all over now. How do you feel?"

YOU: "You're not going to make me cry on national television, Jim."

Puts things in perspective, doesn't it? Nagano, Japan, is host to the 1998 Winter Olympics. Although the Winter Olympics are always overshadowed by Big Brother Summer, skiing, skating and for the first time, snowboarding, are being watched by millions.

Most of us will catch a minute or two of the action. Most of the athletes will be people you've never heard of.

But fame is not why these athletes compete.

In one of my first interviews with an athlete for one of my first sports articles, K-State Olympic high-jumper Ed Broxterman gave me one of the best quotes I've gotten from an athlete to date (thanks, Ed).

He said, "Olympians tend to be more focused, more energetic, more human than professional athletes. We don't do it for the fame and fortune. We only do it for the dream."

When Olympic athletes fail, dreams are shattered.

When Green Bay loses the Super Bowl, or Michael Jordan misses the game-winning jumper (OK, that never happens), or Tiger Woods goes into the clubhouse over par, sure, that's failure. But they still go home with a fat paycheck.

Only 204 of the about 2,500 Olympians in Nagano will take home a medal. For every 100 athletes, only three will receive a gold one. And an incredible 92 percent will go home empty-handed.

Staggering statistics, considering the years of blood, sweat and icy hot each athlete puts into achieving the Olympic dream.

Even with the changing rules allowing pros to compete in certain events, the Olympics remain the purest form of competition in sports.

These athletes compete with two goals in mind — achieving personal success and making their countries proud.

But why? Why do the 92 percent go through tireless training and annoying aches and pains, knowing their chance of taking home a gold is so slim?

Because maybe Michelle Kwan will miss that triple Lutz. Maybe Alberto Tomba's ski will pop off. Maybe the bus carrying the Canadian hockey team will get lost on the way to the rink.

Then, the drama begins.

Through some person's failure, another person succeeds. Twisted, but true. When your significant others end things, they've gotten something they wanted. They're happy now. Even if, for a while, you're not.

When we fail, we still succeed at some level.

Flunking a test shows us that we need to seek help. With help, we can become successful.

So, when the four-man luge competition is on television, watch for a minute. Even if you have no clue as to what's going on.

Give the unknowns their 15 minutes in the spotlight — their chance to succeed or fail.

They've earned it.

Just be thankful that when we fail, it doesn't show up as a 25 share in the Nielsen ratings.

Publicity stunt in free-speech zone features cast of 'Goodnight Desdemona' to increase turnout

DIANA LEE
Kansas State Collegian

The curtain goes up at 8 tonight for the opening performance of

"Goodnight Desdemona, Good Morning Juliet," in Nichols Theatre, following an attempt by the theater department to publicize the show.

They distributed fliers for a mock protest in the free-speech zone that the cast and crew of "Goodnight Desdemona" hope will boost audience turnout for the performance.

She has everyone up in arms by touching Shakespeare improperly, which sparked the idea for this fake demonstration," Marci Maullar, assistant professor of speech communication, theater and dance said.

Professor Ledbelly, played by Shelley Befort, finds herself in the middle of "Romeo and Juliet" and "Othello," through a rather interesting twist of fate.

"My character is not written in, so she has to find her place in the play that is going on around her. There is a lot of confronting of stereotypes. When she falls through the wastebasket into one of the plays, she is fighting the stereotypes of the characters in her mind. She finds out that Juliet isn't really sweet and innocent at all," Befort said.

The play will also incorporate a sword fight, which is not uncommon when dealing with works by Shakespeare.

"As many people know, in various Shakespearean plays there are sword fights and scenes requiring them. With the tie-in to 'Romeo and Juliet' it needed to be included. We had a student studying it, who also choreographed the pieces. It's really funny because the play is a comic interpretation," Maullar said.

Showtimes for "Desdemona:"

Benefit reception to honor alumnus, raise money for scholarships

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

While coming of age in the early 1930s in Kansas City, Kan., Matt Betton would drive into Missouri to swing clubs on the weekends in the city's celebrated 18th and Vine district.

"I jammed a lot of times with Count Basic," said Betton, a Manhattan resident and 1938 K-State graduate in music education. "Down on 18th Street at 3 o'clock in the morning — that was a great era. You had to have quite a bit of experience jamming because if you didn't know where you were in the music, you didn't get invited back."

Betton will be honored Friday evening with an invitation-only reception sponsored by President Jon Wefald and Ruth Ann Wefald at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

The reception benefits the Matt Betton Jazz Scholarship Fund, which provides scholarships to prospective jazz students. The benefit will feature Jon Faddis, who performs on Saturday, the K-State Jazz Quintet and Willie Hill, the president-elect of the International Association of Jazz Educators, an organization Betton helped found.

Looking back at his years in the Kansas

City scene (he was awarded a key to the city in 1983), Betton becomes a bit nostalgic for times when jazz was revolutionary — a time when young people flocked to hear its unrestricted sound. A music of freedom, as Betton puts it. Although he hasn't visited the new 18th and Vine jazz museum, he doesn't have to see it to know what it looks like.

"I feel like I own it, I've been down there so much," Betton said. "It is the center of the Kansas City style."

Betton said the heyday of the Kansas City scene fizzled after Tom Pendergast, a political boss, was stopped from "running" the city, however corrupt. After that, the unions took over and prohibited jazz musicians from sitting in on unpaid jam sessions during all hours of the night.

"It was really a phenomena," Betton recalled. "The club owners would hire a piano player. By 9:30 p.m., there would be a bass player and a drummer. By midnight, they'd have a whole band."

High school leaders to learn new skills

► K-STATE CONFERENCE TO TEACH STUDENTS LEADERSHIP METHODS.

KELLY DICKSON
Kansas State Collegian

High school leaders from across Kansas will learn how to be better leaders Thursday at a leadership conference in the K-State Student Union.

In the past, Student Governing Association, Union Program Council and other groups have organized the Kansas High School Leadership Conference, which is in its 10th year.

Now it is in the hands of the Office of Leadership Studies and Programs and Blue Key National Honorary. About 300 students from 60 high schools are attending the conference.

"The numbers are lower now than when the conference was first started, but they are consistent with the past few years," said Ryan Kerschen, coordinator for Blue Key and senior in chemistry.

The students will attend sessions in the morning.

"When they arrive they have options of what sessions to go to. There are different topics related to leadership such as time management, getting involved in college and conflict management," said Amy Donahy, president of Blue Key and senior in English.

All of the sessions are being conducted by K-State faculty or students. Donahy said the conference benefits the high school students that attend.

"They benefit both by the content of the sessions, and they are also receiving a resource packet on different leadership topics," Donahy said. "It is also a motivational experience."

After the sessions, students will have lunch while listening to Coach Bill Snyder speak. Following lunch, there will be breakout sessions where students can sit down and discuss problems and solutions with other Kansas leaders.

The day ends in Forum Hall at 2:30 p.m. with the keynote speaker, Kevin Saunders.

Saunders is the former Best All Around Wheelchair Athlete in the World. He was a gold medal winner in the pentathlon at the 1992 Paralympics and a bronze medalist in wheelchair racing in 1988.

He won four medals at the 1990 Pan American Games and a gold medal in 1990 at the World Track and Field Championships.

Saunders speaks to various groups and organizations and serves on the President's Council on Physical Fitness.

"He is a phenomenal model of service leadership, and he is a model of never say die. Kind of like the Nike ad, 'Just do it,'" Susan Scott, adviser to Blue Key, said.

"You know, we are inviting all the college campus because I think he's got good messages, not just for high school students, but they are relevant to anybody."

Kansas driver's license requirements might be changed

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — A bill requiring Kansans getting their first drivers' licenses to complete a drug and alcohol education course ran into problems Wednesday in a Senate committee.

Sponsoring Sen. Larry Salmans, R-Hanston, agreed his bill faces an uphill battle in the Transportation and Tourism Committee but said he wasn't ready to call it quits.

Under the bill, a first-time license applicant must complete a four-hour education course on drug and alcohol abuse taught by a state-certified drug and alcohol counselor.

The applicant would have to present a certificate showing completion of the program, which could cost up to $35, before being issued a license.

In Kansas, a person can get a learner's permit or a farm license at age 14 and an unrestricted license at age 16. There are 30,000 new drivers each year in the state, and some 1.8 million Kansans are licensed to drive.

Chairman Ben Vidricksen was unable to get a second on a motion to endorse the bill, forcing him to adjourn the committee meeting.

He said the bill would be brought back up for consideration at a later date, perhaps next week.

"The bill's in trouble, no question about it," Vidricksen, R-Salina, said. "I think some people saw it as setting up another level of bureaucracy, another roadblock."

Gene Johnson, lobbyist for Alcohol Safety Action Project coordinators, who backs the bill, agreed.

"People are against making things mandatory," Johnson said. "But they don't look at the big picture, in that it's educational."

Vidricksen, who supports the bill, said he feels something can be worked out to get the measure advanced to the Senate for debate.

"Anything we do to make them jump through another hoop and learn responsibility is good," the chairman said of the teen drivers.

In his dreadlocks and wire-rimmed glasses, Byron defies bland swing-era stereotypes before he even plays a note. His musical interests range from Stravinsky to Motown.

In addition to the first musical set, Byron and his friends will perform a remarkable score he created to Scar of Shame. This 1920s silent classic once labeled a "race movie," focuses on the life of urban blacks in the 1920s.

"Byron plays with almost alarming command. If he carries anything from his klezmer work, it is his ability to make the clarinet cry, laugh, lecture and mourn as if it were human..."

Jazz director hopes reception for scholarships brings in $20,000 for prospective jazz students

voted the No. 1 college dance band in the country by Billboard Magazine.

Betton also established his own music store in 1951 in Manhattan. In 1968, he was the prime founder of the International Association of Jazz Educators, an organization based in Manhattan.

Betton, who plays clarinet, saxophone and some piano, maintained a band in some form or another into the 1980s. His last outing, in 1983, was as musical director for the local Palace Dixieland Jazz Band.

An adjunct professor at K-State from 1983 to 1986, Betton has an honorary doctorate of music from the Berklee College of Music. As a musician with an education background, he talks often about making jazz a more appreciated art form in the United States. He said the most important thing is for children to hear the right kind of jazz, because even he doesn't care much for far out, newer jazz styles.

"Kids today aren't very taken with jazz because they don't know those songs," Betton said, referring to such composers as Gershwin or Porter. "The jazz that sells to the public has to have a beat and be understandable."

Central to Betton's hopes for K-State's jazz program is his scholarship fund, established in 1978.

"We're in competition with KU and Wichita State for good jazz players," Betton said. "Because of the lack of scholarships, we don't get near as many as we should. K-State has always been lowest on the totem pole when it comes to scholarships."

Dennis Wilson, director of jazz studies, said he hopes to raise between $15,000 and $20,000 at Friday night's benefit.

Betton attended the January conference of the IAJE in New York. He had served as executive director of IAJE from 1968 to 1986. He is now executive director emeritus. Bill McFarlin, executive director of IAJE, said Betton was instrumental in making jazz a respected art form to be taught in schools.

"Jazz programs have grown exponentially as a direct result of Matt's efforts in those early years," McFarlin said.

Betton has seen his share of publicity in past years, but is flattered he will be honored again on Friday.

He said he won't be missing Saturday night's sold-out concert, which features the Count Basie Orchestra with Faddis.

Referring to the sold-out concert, Betton said, "That's a justification that jazz is here to stay."

Bill prohibiting late-term abortion fails in Kansas Senate

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — For the second time, the Kansas Senate has failed to send Gov. Bill Graves a bill that would significantly toughen the state's abortion law.

On a 19-21 vote, the Senate failed Thursday to concur with House amendments to a bill banning all third-trimester abortions. A similar concurrence motion last April failed, 18-22.

Unless there is a successful reconsideration vote today, there can be no other attempt to concur with the House bill this session. However, the bill remains in a conference committee, which could reach a compromise and submit it to both houses this year.

Graves reiterated his concern before Thursday's vote on enacting abortion legislation that might not withstand constitutional scrutiny.

"We seem to have kind of a double standard," Graves told reporters. "If the constitution is working in your favor, you're all for it, but if it's somehow not in line with your way of thinking, they tend to dismiss it as something we ought to enjoy challenging legally."

After nearly an hour's debate, the Senate voted on a motion by Sen. Les Donovan, R-Wichita, to concur with House amendments to an abortion regulation bill that passed both chambers last year — but in different forms.

The conference committee was unable to resolve those differences at the end of last session.

"There's nothing we're going to do this year that is more important than this," Donovan said. "Kansas has a reputation of being a place where a woman can go any time to have an abortion ... We can do better than that."

As passed by the Senate last session, the bill would have banned the specific procedure commonly known as partial-birth abortion.

The procedure involves partially extracting a fetus, legs first; cutting an incision in the barely visible skull base; then draining the contents of the skull so it will fit through the birth canal.

The House amended it to prohibit all abortions after 24 weeks of pregnancy, known as the third trimester, except to save the life of the mother.

The bill remains in a House-Senate conference committee that hasn't produced a reworked version for consideration.

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, the Senate's chief conferee, said she hopes negotiators can get together on a compromise version.

Unless the Senate reconsiders the bill today — not seen as likely — its rules prohibit another vote on the House amendments. The Senate still can vote on whatever the conference committee produces.

Oleen said the House version is unconstitutional because of court rulings that such laws must include provision for the mother's health; that only physicians — not lawmakers — can determine fetus viability, and any sanctions must specify a crime.

"Let us try to come up with something that is enforceable," Oleen urged colleagues.

Oleen reminded the Senate that Kansas already has a law banning third trimester abortion except to save the woman's life or if the fetus is affected by life-threatening deformity or abnormality.

"There's not a single example of a healthy baby being aborted in Kansas," Oleen told reporters after the vote.

Few minds were changed from the last vote on the bill. Only Democrat Janis Lee of Kennington, switched — this time voting for the bill. She said she no longer has doubts about its constitutionality.

Education plan to be revealed, explained today

NATE JENKINS
Kansas State Collegian

The Kansas House Select Committee on Higher Education, in charge of restructuring higher education governance in Kansas, will meet this morning at K-State to explain its plan for change.

The Manhattan stop is part of the committee's statewide tour of 14 universities and community colleges.

Committee members will explain their plan and answer questions during an 8 a.m. meeting today in the Hale Library Hemisphere Room.

The committee will present its plan to overhaul the organization of education leadership in Kansas, in part by replacing the Kansas Board of Regents with a Council on Higher Education.

Besides governing Washburn and the six universities now under the regents, the proposed council would also coordinate the activities of community colleges and vocational technical schools. Though community colleges would keep their local boards of trustees and set their own budgets, the council would have the power to limit the state funds they receive.

The special committee's proposal includes the largest increase in new funding for higher education in state history — $50 million to reduce community college and Washburn property-tax mill levies and $87 million to enhance programs, raise faculty salaries and purchase new technology equipment.

Kansas voters would have to approve a constitutional

Senate approves privilege fee hike to help fund CIP

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
Kansas State Collegian

The Course Information Proposal cleared its next-to-last hurdle at Student Senate's Thursday meeting when senators passed 48-2 a $14,810 privilege fee increase to pay for the program.

The increase means about a 55-cent increase per full-time student per semester.

If passed by Faculty Senate in May, CIP would survey students in undergraduate classes about various aspects of the course. That course information would be published on the Internet and in print form to help students make enrollment decisions.

CIP Committee President Chris Hansen, who proposed the idea last year as student body president, said course information is insurance for students.

"For about 55 cents, students are kind of buying an insurance policy," he said. "We all know what happens if we make bad enrollment decisions. We get into the first few weeks of the semester, decide we're in completely the wrong class, go back to drop it and are out a couple hundred bucks."

During debate, Veterinary Medicine Sen. Aaron Truax and Arts and Sciences Sen. T.J. Schreiner proposed an amendment that would have exempted students in the College of Veterinary Medicine and the graduate school from paying the fee.

Truax said those students, who don't take lower-level, general education classes, shouldn't pay the fee because they don't benefit from it.

Student Senate Vice Chair Tracey Mann said that argument didn't stand.

"That argument is like a leaking sieve. It does not hold water. We pay a fee for Lafene, and a line item of that fee goes to the Women's Clinic," Mann said. "I wasn't born yesterday, but I can't use the Women's Clinic."

The amendment failed 12-33.

In other business, Senate unanimously approved a continuance of the Union Program Council privilege fee for fiscal year 1999 at $69,992.

CHANGE OF COMMAND

Ceremony laden with tradition, helps welcome new commander

FORT RILEY — Maj. Gen. Freddy E. McFarren, whose last Army assignment was in Egypt, assumed command of Fort Riley on Thursday.

In a tradition-laced ceremony at Marshall Army Air Field, McFarren took over from Brig. Gen. Mitchell Zais, who had been interim commander since Jan. 9.

Zais, the post's deputy commanding general for maneuver, took over temporarily when Maj. Gen. Michael Dodson left to become operations director for the U.S. Central Command at MacDill Air Force Base in Florida.

"We will train to ensure that we can meet any mission that's given to us by the National Command Authority," McFarren said. "We will continue to improve the deployment facilities and programs to guarantee that we can deploy soldiers and programs throughout the world on short notice."

"And we will continue to do our best to improve those programs that are in place to support our soldiers and their families."

Lt. Gen. Thomas A. Schwartz of Fort Hood, Texas, commanding general for the Army's III Corps, said McFarren has commanded in every significant combat operation from Vietnam to Desert Storm.

Most recently, McFarren was assigned to Cairo, Egypt, as chief of the Office of Military Cooperation at the American Embassy.

The new commander is a West Point graduate with a master's degree in education from Duke. Before going to Egypt, he was at the Pentagon as director of training in the Office of the Deputy Chief of Staff for Operations and Plans. He has also been commandant of cadets at West Point, assistant division commander of the 24th Infantry Division at Fort Stewart, Ga., and an assistant chief of staff with the XVIII Airborne Corps at Fort Bragg, N.C.

U.N. tells aid workers to stay out of Iraq in anticipation of invasion

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — The United Nations advised relief workers on leave from jobs in Iraq on Thursday not to return because of concerns over a possible U.S. military strike. Their absence will further hamper efforts to aid Iraqis suffering under international sanctions.

The decision affecting about one-quarter of the U.N.'s relief staff in Iraq is part of a contingency plan being drafted as diplomatic efforts to end the standoff over weapons inspections appear to falter.

The aid workers work separately from the arms inspectors trying to ensure that Iraq has destroyed its weapons of mass destruction.

The United States has threatened air strikes against Iraq unless its inspectors have free access to all sites where weapons might be hidden. Iraq has denied them access to Saddam Hussein's palaces and other sites Iraq considers to be symbols of its national sovereignty.

The move to reduce the U.N. presence in Baghdad followed the rejection of Iraq's latest overture to resolve the crisis. Iraq offered to open eight presidential complexes for two months to new weapons inspectors selected by the U.N. secretary-general — concessions the country's foreign minister described as the red lines that Baghdad cannot cross.

Foreign Minister Saeed al-Sahhaf called the American rejection of Iraq's offer a bluff that could backfire. Britain also flatly dismissed the Iraqi proposal.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair, who has promised full military support for any air strike, has ordered a second aircraft carrier, the HMS Illustrious, to the Persian Gulf.

Jury awards damages of $80.7 million to former UPS manager poked in breast

DES MOINES, Iowa — A jury Thursday awarded $80.7 million to a former United Parcel Service manager who said UPS retaliated against her after she accused a driver of poking her in the breast.

The Polk County jury agreed with Linda Channon, a 22-year UPS employee, who said the shipping company fostered a hostile work environment when it failed to listen to her complaints of harassment and punished her for them.

UPS was ordered to pay her $500,000 in compensatory damages and $80.2 million in punitive damages.

Channon, 47, said she was poked in the breast by a driver under her supervision during an argument in 1993. The driver was fired but was then rehired and began stalking her, said her attorney, Roxanne Conlin.

"The people above her refused to provide her any protection, then started being critical of her and her efforts in a way that was simply unfair," she said.

Channon said that UPS moved her from job to job, shunning and excluding her from meetings and giving her assignments that men were not given.

"I had different standards than the men had," she said. "Every day I was being screamed at, being belittled, being humiliated. Those are things that are hard emotionally when you've worked at a place a long time and been very dedicated and done a very good job."

She left the company on doctor's orders in 1996.

Allegations of Marine hazing surface 1 year after shocking, bloody incident

PARRIS ISLAND, S.C. — A year after the nation was shocked by bloody images of Marines pounding medals into each other's chests comes a new picture of young Marines being subjected to beatings, Thursday night fights and mock crucifixions.

Four privates are in the brig at Parris Island, charged with hazing and severely beating a fellow Marine because he supposedly had gotten his platoon in trouble for failing to do some routine tasks.

Pvt. Maciej Lugowski, 20, of New York City lost his spleen and suffered other injuries in the assault Dec. 17, six months after the nation's top Marine declared the Corps would not tolerate hazing.

"It's despicable to us to see this type of activity," said Maj. Rick Long, a spokesman for the Corps' training depot. "People are shocked that Marines would engage in this type of activity against other Marines."

After a week in the hospital and a month's leave, Lugowski is back at Fort Knox, Ky., the Army base where the assault took place.

He and his alleged assailants were among about 350 Marines, many fresh out of basic training, who go through the Army's armor school each year to learn to be tank mechanics and drivers.

At a preliminary hearing Wednesday for one of the accused, defense attorney Maj. Bill Weber said new trainees at Fort Knox were soon visited by other Marines who punched, cursed and dragged them into the hall. Those who did not fight back had their heads flushed in the toilet, he said.

Navy investigators also have said that Thursday nights were set aside for more senior trainees to fight newer ones in "love sessions," in which the only instructions were not to hit in the face or below the belt. Kidney punches were encouraged.

There are also allegations of mock crucifixions, with trainees' hands taped to broomsticks pushed through the backs of their shirts.

Weber said that a sergeant was present at the Thursday night fights, but that officers ignored the hazing.

He said his client, Pvt. Jacob Isaacs, 18, of McKee, Ky., had been sparring with Lugowski in his room, just as other Marines did all the time, when the other defendants came in and things got out of hand.

Canadian snowboarder regains his gold on technicality; board rules against IOC

NAGANO, Japan — Canadian snowboarder Ross Rebagliati got his gold medal back on a technicality Thursday, one day after it was taken away because he tested positive for marijuana.

Avoiding the thorny question of recreational drug use, the Court for Arbitration of Sport said it ruled on one point and one point only: the International Olympic Committee, lacking an agreement with the International Ski Federation on marijuana use, could not strip Rebagliati of his medal.

"It's purely the legal issue. It's not our role to examine the social issues at this stage," Jean Philippe Rochat, secretary general of the CAS, said Thursday in upholding Rebagliati's appeal.

"It's a clear message that if the international sports body wants such rules, it has to specify clearly that marijuana is a forbidden substance," Rochat said.

The panel's decision was unanimous, didn't require a vote and cannot be appealed, Rochat said. Both the IOC and Rebagliati were notified; the IOC said it would comply with the ruling.

Rebagliati, 26, of Whistler, British Columbia, won the men's giant slalom on Sunday in the first Winter Games at which snowboarding has been a medal sport. As a winner, he submitted a urine sample.

On Wednesday, the IOC said it was taking away Rebagliati's medal because the test came back positive for marijuana — 17.8 nanograms per milliliter. Rebagliati maintains he hasn't smoked marijuana since April 1997 and must have inhaled second-hand smoke during a going-away party in Canada late last month.

The appeals panel's decision hinged on the legal intricacies of agreements between the IOC and the ski federation.

Both the IOC and the ski federation include marijuana on their lists of banned substances. But the two bodies have no formal agreement governing the use of marijuana by Olympic skiers or snowboarders. As a result, the IOC had no power to strip Rebagliati's medal because of the positive marijuana test, the panel ruled.

Though nothing indicates Rebagliati came into contact with marijuana in Japan, he also faces a criminal investigation here. He appeared for questioning Thursday at a police station near the Shiga Kogen ski area, the snowboarding venue, leaving after several hours.

JESSIE LEE BROWN FOVEAUX SIGNS HER AUTOGRAPH FOR MARY CUMMINGS OF BLAINE, KAN., THURSDAY AFTERNOON IN THE K-STATE STUDENT UNION.

Local author signs book of her times

STORY BY CLAUDETTE RILEY • PHOTO BY IVAN KOZAR

For more than two hours, Manhattan author Jessie Lee Brown Foveaux signed more than 100 copies of her autobiography, "Any Given Day," and chatted with neighbors.

The book-signing from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. Thursday had students and book lovers from the community standing in long lines on the first floor of the K-State Union Bookstore.

Foveaux, 98, wrote the story of her life as a Christmas gift to her family. The great-grandmother later sold her handwritten memoir to Warner Books, a Time-Warner company, for $1 million.

Carrie Mitchell, book division manager, said the Union Bookstore sold 41 copies of the book before Thursday. More than 50 hardback copies were sold the first hour of the book-signing with a total of at least 70 for Thursday.

"We thought a book signing would be of interest to students, and Jessie was very happy to do it," Mitchell said.

Mitchell said the Union Bookstore has stocked Foveaux's book since before Christmas.

"It has sold very well. It's a big gift item. It's local interest so it sells itself," Mitchell said. "It's part of living history. It's great to meet someone who has lived through so much of what we as Americans study and learn about."

Marion Foveaux said his mother is always happy to autograph books, because it gives her a chance to meet people.

"She really enjoys this. People send her letters and news clippings from all over, even papers in New Zealand and England," Marion Foveaux said. "This seemed like a worthwhile deal. A good gesture. We had no reason not to come."

After signing books at Claffin Books and Copies, and Waldenbooks, Foveaux's fourth and last book signing in Manhattan will be Nov. 22 at the Fairview Inn.

Deborah Bartlett, graduate student in sociology, said Foveaux's book, "Any Given Day," is used as a textbook for her Gerontology 600 seminar.

"After a certain age, we have an idea that people aren't productive, and this book shows that there are some who can be productive and share things with people of all ages," Bartlett said.

Bartlett finished reading the book last week and said it works as a textbook because it talks about what life was like in Kansas this century.

"She tells about a way of living in a time when it was hard," Bartlett said. "She talked about moving around, and how hard it was to just get settled and be uprooted again. My dad was in the military, and I could relate to her story."

Heather McKinley, senior in elementary education, started reading Foveaux's book this week.

"I have wanted to read it for a long time," McKinley said. "I was born in Manhattan, so the local history interested me."

McKinley brought two books. She was having the second one signed for her mother's birthday in April.

Katie Korpinen, senior in special education, said she gave a copy of the book to her mother in Overland Park, Kan. When she heard about the book signing, she had her mother mail the book back to Manhattan.

"It would have been less expensive to buy another one," Korpinen said. "But I wanted my book."

Korpinen, who dubbed herself Foveaux's No. 1 fan, said she bought the book last November after reading excerpts in the newspaper.

"I am intrigued with Manhattan, because it's a smaller community, and wanted to know the history of it."

KSU-Salina offers hands-on choices for students in math, science courses

BRENNAL TALLEY
Kansas State Collegian

Difficult math and science classes might drive some engineering students to look at hands-on technology courses at the K-State-Salina campus.

While both K-State's College of Engineering and K-State-Salina's technology courses are accredited and have bachelor's degrees available, the programs still have distinct differences, said Leonard Gold, head of the engineering technology department for K-State-Salina.

"Engineering students deal with design and analysis," Gold said. "Technology is more hands-on. Students do not get away with less work in technology classes."

Kurt Jones, senior in mechanical engineering technology, said he took classes in Manhattan before moving to K-State-Salina.

"Basically, I wasn't very happy with my degree. I wanted to use my hands," he said.

At the Salina campus, mechanical labs consist of creating two- and three-dimensional designs, trying them out in the machine shop and manufacturing them on a conventional mill, Jones said.

"An engineering technician is like a middleman," he said. "We take the theoretical and technical aspects and relate them down so something can be done with them." Jones said this process requires creativity.

"I would say the biggest challenge out here would be visualizing, taking the project from the beginning, just theory, through all the steps and finally coming up with the perfect item you wanted," Jones said.

Classes in both curricula are similar in the core freshman requirements, such as algebra, macroeconomics and English. But at Salina, most classes are laboratory environments where students combine theory and mechanics.

Eric Falk, senior in mechanical engineering technology, said he transferred to Salina not only because of his interest in the program but also because of course demands in Manhattan.

"I was frustrated with the amount of math and science requirements," Falk said.

Both Jones and Falk said smaller class sizes and lower student-teacher ratios are benefits of taking technology classes at K-State-Salina.

Jones also said his grades have benefited from the transfer. He acquired a strong math background while at K-State, making the transition to technology at the Salina campus much simpler, he said.

Falk said he compares the additional attention from instructors to his previous years at Butler County Community College.

Gold said Kansas businesses such as Koch Industries and local Salina businesses like Premier Pneumatics and KASA are hiring students from the technology school.

Falk said he is interested in working for those kinds of companies.

"I'm looking for tooling and machine design in actual day-to-day production design problems," Falk said.

Jones said that as he approaches graduation in December, he grows more confident that he can get the job he wants.

"I think starting salary is a little less, but everyone I know has gotten a job within their career," he said.

Enhancement series out to help graduates become a top card in chosen career field

BRENNAL TALLEY
Kansas State Collegian

For students interested in learning how to make A's in class, obtain a high-paying job after graduation or be a good leader, the K-State-Salina campus is offering ACES, Salina's first Academic and Career Enhancement Series.

The program is sponsored by Career and Employment Services, the Academic Achievement Center and the Office of Student Life.

Sessions are running through the end of March in the career, academic and leadership areas. After completing two sessions in each area, students will receive a certificate of completion and become a certified "ACE."

Toni Fink, coordinator of Career and Employment Services, said the program is in a trial phase.

"I think we need to work on awareness," she said.

Fink said she thought one session, "How to work a career fair," on March 4, would be useful for graduating students.

"With the technology students in demand, this may help them make the most of their time and get more exposure," Fink said.

Fink also said the technology school's career day is coming in March. She added that all the booths are filled already, and there is now a waiting list for space.

Future sessions in the series might help students achieve their career goals or offer an edge in the job market. These sessions include test-taking strategies, assertiveness training, communication and behavior, and a résumé critique session.

Basie Orchestra brings welcome beat to McCain

It's as simple as supply and demand. Making its fourth appearance in McCain Auditorium, the Grammy award-winning Count Basie Orchestra is supplying K-State with the premiere jazz festival of the school year. Several thousand ticket-holders have made clear the demand for jazz in Manhattan. Of course, it wasn't too long ago that jazz was almost a mum word in Manhattan. Thank Dennis Wilson, director of jazz studies and the festival, for putting K-State on the jazz culture map. The Count Basie Orchestra couldn't be here without an auditorium like McCain to play in. This is just one of many terrific events made possible by a great auditorium's dedication to a diversity of arts. From here, the jazz program at K-State can get even better. The festival has more than 25 schools participating this year. That means there will be nearly 600 potential recruits to the K-State music program. If nothing else, the prominence and growth of the K-State Jazz Festival shows there is a real audience for jazz in Manhattan and at K-State. Students should take part in the festival. By doing so, they expose themselves to culture and great music. They also reassure those involved in the production that the effort to bring jazz to Manhattan is appreciated. Because as much as the festival helps the jazz program at K-State, it is still being performed for an eager audience. While Saturday's concert is already sold out, it doesn't mean jazz lovers are going to be left in the dark. Jon Faddis, director of the Carnegie Hall Jazz Band and one of the most important jazz artists in the world, will sit in with local band Wasted Potential at Auntie Mae's Parlor the night before the concert. More than anything else, the popularity of this event should be a reminder to buy tickets early next year.

HEROES

Take time to recognize admirable people close to you

I have often wondered what it would be like to know a hero. To stand next to a person you know as friend, but the world knows as heroic. I think about being able to behold the spectacular achievements. To witness the glory. Not by reading about them in the newspaper, or in history books after the deeds are finished, but by being there. To live each moment of every historic act. I just looked up the word "hero" in my Webster's dictionary. The definition was not what I expected: a man who is celebrated for special achievements and attributes. Did you capture the last word? Attributes. Characteristics that mark a person. I find difficulty in recalling any personal friends who are publicly acclaimed for being heroes — it is the "celebrated" that throws a kink. Maybe that is because no one has ever recognized them as having the traits. But true heroism is not dependent on fame. My roommate, Jerry, has overcome adversity like I have never experienced. He chose to rise out of the depths of impossible circumstances. His childhood dealt him ample opportunity to follow the paths of poverty and death. He overcame. He chose to conquer obstacles such as being the first member of his family to graduate from high school. Jerry could have chosen the easy street. He could have given up when no one cared if he succeeded. Now he is an example of motivation — he shows me how to combat distractions that prohibit me from being my best. He exhibits attributes of a hero. My parents, Jim and Gayle. Mom chose to give up working as a nurse so that when I stepped through the front door after school, she could be there. My family did without modern pleasures that we could have had if Mom had worked full time. She could have given me a larger allowance, but instead I got homemade meals. (Blackberry cobbler was the best.) I don't miss the money. I have memories worth far more than the largest allowance in the world. Working at home might not have been the most popular role to fulfill, but my mom loved me too much to settle for less. And since it was financially possible to stay home, she did. While it might sound frivolous, my dad really enjoyed watching television. The strange thing is that we didn't have a television when I was young. I am sure Dad would have enjoyed coming home from work and watching the evening news, or viewing a movie at night, but he chose instead to be his children's entertainment. I spent countless hours wrestling with my dad on the living room floor. We played Candy Land and built things with Lincoln Logs. We read stories. Dad held me with his feet while I soared like an airplane above him. He was there. My parents strove to teach me how to work for what I get. To be honest in my dealings with others. Not to be ashamed to associate with people of low disposition. To have fun. Have Mom and Dad achieved heroic status? I think so. Don't miss the heroes in your life. They might be a parent, a roommate, a professor or even a staff member who washes the windows in your classrooms at night. Don't assume that these people know what it means to hear the simple word "Thanks." OK, maybe your roommate has not elevated to the status of a hero. Maybe an annoyance is a better comparison. (Mine is at times, especially when he starts singing songs he doesn't know.) When you can spot the attributes that make a hero, let it be known. Grateful recognition usually sinks farther than the surface smile. Since it's the season for love and all that, we have good reason to observe qualities worthy of our adoration.

GRATEFUL RECOGNITION USUALLY SINKS FARTHER THAN THE SURFACE SMILE

Teacher Validation

'Cool' journalism instructor lives up to Mrs. McCloud's praise

Along the educational path, a student will only bump into a few truly wonderful teachers — teachers who should be on their own trading cards. Teachers who should have capes flying majestically behind them. I was playing the valve trombone in the jazz band the first semester of my sophomore year in high school. Mary Anne McCloud, the newspaper adviser, kept prodding me to take Introduction to Journalism. I was hesitant — this was the valve trombone we were talking about (never mind the fact that I couldn't even read bass clef). She saw something in me I never would've seen myself. She was relentless, so I eventually traded in the ol' trombone for a pica pole and a textbook second semester. After that, I joined the newspaper staff and proceeded to learn more about everything than I'd ever learned about any one subject. Mrs. McCloud (or MC Cloudy Fresh, as we accidentally dubbed her one year) taught us to play fair to one another along with showing us how to use PageMaker. She would correct our potty mouths not by giving us office referrals, but by saying things such as, "I wouldn't have in my hand what you just had in your mouth." When the newspaper staff traveled to conferences, we realized that other schools didn't have what we had in a newspaper adviser. Some schools' student newspapers weren't really student papers, and the students weren't taught to seek the truth. They just made sure everyone was portrayed in a good light. We were lucky to have Mrs. McCloud, who took her role as adviser literally — she was there to advise us, nothing more. As a teacher, she was more interested in seeing us learn something in her classes than just merely getting an A. When I chose K-State, Mrs. McCloud told me about Ron Johnson, Collegian news adviser. "He is so cool," she said in her Mrs. McCloud way. I knew if she thought someone was cool, she didn't mean he rode into class on a Harley, with a cigar between his teeth. She meant really cool — like her. She was right, of course. Ron turned out to be just like Mrs. McCloud in his philosophy on student newspapers. And as a teacher, he shows that kind of "tough love" to his students. (I have the scars to prove it.) He wants us to learn how to be able to succeed not just while we're in college, but also when we get the rock out of here. Ron has always been supportive of journalism students as well as students who work on the Collegian. He mediated more than one childish argument between desk editors last semester by showing people how to solve problems on their own, not by shooting the parties away. He never claimed immunity from such petty trials. Every semester, he reiterates to the Collegian staff that the newspaper is not his. Never does he stand in the middle of the newsroom, wielding a Bible and a red pen, telling the staff they can't report on this or that. A true proponent of the student press, he wants us to be truthful, accurate and fair. Even those students who have never had a class with him know how to be all three of those, because they learned by Ron's example. The only time Ron can be found in the newsroom is during staff meetings and when he's dropping off a wicker bull full of candy for weary staffers. He's always a welcome sight, but he knows his presence is better for us when it's rare. Good teachers are hard to find. If you do find one, grab them by the cape and don't let go.

LUCKY CHARMS: Figure skater Elvis Stojko received a good-luck visit from a couple other pretty good Canadian skaters, Eric Lindros and Chris Pronger.

"It's incredible what Elvis can do," said Lindros, captain of the Canadian Olympic hockey team. "His skating is great. He's a great showman."

Stojko didn't do much at his workout while Lindros and Pronger watched. He skipped his jumps, but completed his spins and footwork.

"I can't believe the way he spins," Pronger said. "That's really unbelievable skating, and he didn't even do any jumps."

WE'RE No. 13! After Japan's hockey team beat Austria in a shootout, the hometown fans went into a flag-waving, chanting frenzy. They did the wave while players raced onto the ice and then took a victory lap.

Imagine if Japan had finished better than 13th. The victory Thursday was significant because it was Japan's first Olympic hockey victory since 1976. The Japanese had lost their first three games of this tournament.

The winning goal came on a backhand by Shin Yahata in the eighth round of the shootout. The teams had tied 3-3 in regulation.

OLYMPIC FOOT SOLDIERS: Olympic ski spectators soon might qualify for an honorary medal — in hiking.

Spectators taking shuttle buses to Alpine ski events will be let out at parking lots slightly more than a mile from the course. Previously, they were dropped off much closer to the slopes.

The change was made after bus foul-ups caused an undetermined number of spectators to miss Tuesday's women's super-G race. The delays came as thousands of spectators tried to reach the course on a Japanese national holiday.

Olympic organizers at a news conference apologized a half-dozen times not only for the bus foul-ups, but for the continued bad weather that has caused almost daily alterations in the Alpine schedule.

UNHAPPY DRIVER: With drugs in the Olympic spotlight, American bobsledder Jim Herberich had some harsh words for international officials involved in the Michael Dionne affair.

Dionne, a pusher on the No. 3 four-man sled, was removed from the Olympic team after the International Council for Arbitration in Sports declined to overturn a drug suspension. Dionne said he had inadvertently taken the drug as part of a cold medicine, but was banned for three months for using ephedrine.

Herberich, driver for USA-2, called the whole scenario ridiculous.

"The international organizations need to do a lot better job," he said. "This doping test took place in November. It's absolutely absurd that this should go on this long. It should have been completely resolved by the beginning of January, when we were having our trials. There's no excuse for it taking that long."

Although the urine sample was collected at a World Cup meet in Calgary last November, Dionne's suspension was not announced until last week.

FLU WATCH: Influenza has killed at least two children in Japan this year, and authorities are investigating whether other deaths might have been caused by the sickness.

A total of 353,218 children have contracted influenza or heavy colds this winter, nearly double the 181,200 cases recorded last winter, the Health Ministry said in its latest weekly update.

Tatsuo Miyazaka, a health official in Nagano, said there have been flu cases there, too. But he said that since most schools in Nagano are on holiday during the games, the situation appears under control.

Akio Yoshida, public relations director of the Nagano Olympic Committee, said officials were cautious about the flu but said it hasn't been a problem at the Olympics.

RATING GAME: Yet another day of bad weather delivered another night of low ratings for CBS.

The network, hurt again by the postponement of the men's downhill, got a 15.3 rating and a 24 share Wednesday night. That was 3.9-percent lower than the 22.8 from 1994 and 8.4-percent lower than the 16.7 from 1992.

Through Wednesday, CBS has a 16.3 rating, 33.2-percent lower than the 24.4 in Lillehammer and 14.7-percent lower than the 19.1 in Albertville. The rating for CBS' late-night show continues to struggle, a 1.9 rating and a 10 share Wednesday, compared to a 3.5 and 19 in 1994.

TNT got a 1.3 Wednesday afternoon, 18.8 percent off the 1.6 from 1994. Through three afternoons of coverage, TNT has a 1.2, 25-percent lower than Lillehammer.

A rating point for CBS represents 980,000 households, or 1 percent of the nation's estimated 98 million TV homes. Share is the percentage of in-use televisions tuned to a given show.

TNT's rating is based on 73 million homes.

NAGANO NUGGET: Many of the Olympic venues were built with the help of illegal migrant workers from around Asia, lured by high pay. Now that the construction is over, many of those workers are left with only odd jobs and fears of being deported.

QUOTEBOOK: "I may have to wear a gas mask from now on," Ross Rebagliati, saying he would keep his friends, even if they smoke marijuana — the drug that almost got him kicked out of the Olympics.

In August, k-state women's basketball player brit jacobson and men's player josh reid will become teammates. they're getting married. brit wasn't planning on this a month ago, but they're engaged now, thanks to josh's Decent Proposal

When senior women's basketball guard Brit Jacobson says her new fiance is a player, she means it in the true sense of the word.

Wildcat men's guard Josh Reid proposed to Jacobson on Jan. 15, and she said yes.

"I haven't really dated anybody seriously since I came here," she said. "I've had friends, but I'm very picky. I've kind of waited around."

Jacobson doesn't remember exactly when she first met Reid, but she does remember whom he met before her — ex-Wildcat point guard Amanda Chamberlain.

When Josh first came here on his recruiting visit, he saw her, and she's one of my best friends," said Jacobson, originally from Chugiak, Alaska. "At that point, he'd said, 'I'm definitely coming down here.'"

Reid, a sophomore from Brewster, Kan., remembers it a little differently. "She and Mandy were together that day," Reid said. "The coaches were telling me, 'Yeah, that's Amanda Chamberlain. She'd be good for you.'"

So the couple actually has Chamberlain to thank for getting them together. Reid is in his second year as a Wildcat and Jacobson is finishing her last year of eligibility this season.

Jacobson said she'd been picky about men in the past, but practice, games and studying have taken up a majority of her time as well. She remembered going to a football game in 1996 with Reid and some other players — the core of a college athlete's social circle.

"We all sit by each other and try to do stuff together," she said. "That's kind of how we became friends."

As the school year was ending in May 1997, Chamberlain, Jacobson, Reid and Cat center Joe Leonard found themselves hanging out a lot. Soon, Jacobson said, the group narrowed to herself and Reid. June 1, 1997, is the day the couple calls their first date.

"We never actually went on a 'date,'" she said. "I guess we decided we liked each other then. We decided not to be just 'friends' anymore."

Again, Reid has a different recollection. "We have a lot of arguments about who picked up who first," Reid said, laughing. "We were always real good friends, but we never went on a date. She and her friend would come over and play cards a lot, and things just started building."

While to some it might seem like things quickly progressed, both agree they knew pretty quickly where their relationship was going.

"After about three months, I started wondering if she might be 'the one,'" Reid said. "After Christmas, we started looking at rings."

Jacobson, whose idol — country singer Mindy McCready — epitomizes her self-proclaimed independence, said she called her mother crying the day she realized Reid was worth hanging on to. "Honestly, I probably knew within the first two or three weeks," she said. "I went to a basketball game with him in Wamego to watch his brother and meet his family. We hold the same values, not only in basketball and school, but in life in general."

Jacobson's parents moved from Alaska to Manhattan to be with her and her sister, Sunny. But on the day Reid wanted to ask Jacobson's father for her hand, her dad was back in Alaska.

"I stayed up playing cards with her mom until all hours of the evening," Reid said. "I was real nervous, trying to think of what to say. But I think her family expected it."

When he did get Larry Jacobson on the phone, Reid said they small-talked for a while. But her dad was onto Reid's plan.

"Finally, Larry said, 'So, are you going to marry the girl or what?'" he said. Reid had picked up the ring after practice that afternoon, but Jacobson had fallen asleep on the couch while her mother and Reid were waiting to talk to her father.

"It was late, and I was sleeping," she said. "He came over and put the ring on my finger, which woke me up. He said, 'Will you marry me?' and I said, 'Heck, yeah!'"

"AFTER ABOUT THREE MONTHS, I STARTED WONDERING IF SHE MIGHT BE 'THE ONE.' AFTER CHRISTMAS, WE STARTED LOOKING AT RINGS."

While Jacobson's parents were expecting the proposal, Reid said his were a little surprised.

"The main thing they're worried about is the financial aspect of it," he said. "They expected it, too, but just not so soon. They all had bets on when we'd get married and one of my brothers was the closest — about two years down the road."

Jacobson has one year of school left, and Reid has at least two. But Reid said his father married his mother with one year of college left, and he's gotten advice from all the coaches on the subject. He even considered calling ex-Wildcat Tyrone Davis, who married while still playing basketball at K-State.

"All the coaches are being great about it," he said. "They've taken kind of a fatherly attitude towards it and have shared their experiences with me."

Reid popped the question on a Thursday, and at practice the next day Jacobson broke the news to her teammates.

"I came in and said, 'I don't know what you guys are doing August 8, but I'd like you to be around here,'" she said. "Everyone wanted to know all the details."

Neither planned to become the poster children for Valentine's Day 1998, but Reid said his teammates have laid off teasing him — so far.

"Before I proposed, I was getting a lot of flak," he said. "They knew about it the night before I asked her. Now that I'm engaged, I haven't heard much."

Now that word is getting around, Jacobson said she sees how ironic their timing was.

"I didn't think it was that big a deal," she said. "We just thought it was the right time. But that's what we do. We share our lives with everyone on the basketball court, so I guess it makes sense."

Reid has three brothers and cousin Jake McKee, a freshman tight end at Nebraska, to put somewhere in his wedding party.

Jacobson said her sister likely would be married to senior Cat offensive lineman Todd Weiner by then, and would be her matron of honor. Chamberlain will be the maid of honor, and Jacobson said she thought ex-Cat Missy Decker and junior guard/forward Jenny Coalson would stand up as bridesmaids.

Amazingly enough, the wedding colors might include purple.

"We even thought about having it at Bramlage," Jacobson said. The couple is looking into the St. Thomas More church in Manhattan and will use the church if the date is available. As for now, the season must go on.

"The coaches talk about girls and guys getting distracted by each other and going out — the social thing," she said. "But this takes the pressure off."

The age difference doesn't bother either of them, they said.

"She's a competitive, tough-minded girl," Reid said. "She knows what she wants out of life."

And the engagement to Reid, even though he won't reach the magic age of 21 before the wedding, is just one thing Jacobson wants.

"When your values are the same, they'll never change," she said.

"When you keep them in line with faith like I do, I won't worry about him wanting to 'stretch his wings,' or whatever. There's a huge trust factor there."

a quick look at WILDCAT SPORTS

Hard-to-find rackets stolen

Last week, two tennis rackets were stolen out of the north equipment room in Ahearn Field House. Both rackets belonged to the Wildcats' No. 1 tennis player, Yana Dorodnova.

The rackets are Head Radical Performers, more commonly known as the Andre Agassi line. They are easily recognized by their characteristic bright yellow and gray design.

The loss of these rackets is a problem for Dorodnova because it leaves her with only two Head Radical Performers. She runs the risk of breaking strings and running out of rackets during a match.

Also, the Radical Performer is no longer manufactured by Head, finding a replacement has proven to be nearly impossible.

"Coach (Steve Bietau) has been trying to get me another one, but he can't find any," Dorodnova said.

Dorodnova does not want to buy a new set of rackets because this is her last year of tennis at K-State, and they are very expensive. Anyone with any information about the missing rackets please contact Coach Bietau in the tennis office at 532-7198.

Wildcats win 15-4 on diamond

The K-State baseball team used everyone it could to beat Missouri

Western 15-4 Thursday at Frank Myers Field.

All in all, Coach Mike Clark used 18 different players, just three shy of his entire position roster. What's more, seven different pitchers saw action on the mound as the Cats won their fifth straight against Missouri Western.

"We got a lot of people some playing time. We got the at bats we needed," Clark said.

Cats strive for fewer turnovers

Turning around a 14-game losing streak to No. 4 Kansas in Manhattan will be tough enough for the Wildcats on Saturday. But the team's main concern will be not turning over the ball.

"We definitely need to cut down on the turnovers," junior center Shawn Rhodes said after the Cats' 83-79 defeat of Texas on Wednesday. This was a common theme among the players, as well as Coach Tom Asbury.

The Cats committed 21 turnovers in the 69-62 loss at Allen Fieldhouse on Jan. 17, a mistake Asbury said can't be repeated.

Cats drop 5th straight at UT

Wednesday in Austin, the Wildcat women dropped their fifth-straight game to the Texas Longhorns. Coach Deb Patterson said it was a simple matter of the Cats lost it somewhere in the game.

"With every game in this league you need to come out with enough intensity to win," Patterson said. "I didn't feel we had the intensity to continue to execute."

Sunday's game against Missouri will require intensity to end the losing skid. The Tigers (10-11 overall, 2-9 in the conference) are battling the Cats (9-12, 3-8) at the bottom of the Big 12.

Track team faces test at UNL

With the NCAA Indoor Championships a month away, the K-State track team is bracing itself for a true test of strength.

The Wildcats will have that test against national-caliber opponents this weekend at the Frank Sevigne Husker Invitational in Lincoln, Neb.

"This is a very, very competitive meet," K-State coach Cliff Rovelto said. "Some of the finals will almost resemble the finals of the NCAA meet."

JOEL WHITE/Collegian

Tennis hopes to bounce back

The K-State tennis team is hoping to rebound from a shaky performance in a victory over Wichita State last weekend with a pair of meets this weekend.

The Wildcats travel to Wisconsin today to face the Badgers. From there, they head to Chicago to take on the Northwestern Wildcats on Saturday.

This weekend will mark the toughest competition for the Cats this season.

"We are going to be competing for the first time this year against pretty high-quality competition," K-State coach Steve Bietau said.

Crew to compete Saturday

Indoor rowing started as a competition when six men in Boston were looking for a way to spice up winter training. The first competition, called the CRASH-B sprints, began in 1982.

Ergometers, or rowing machines as we know them, did not come out until 1981.

"There has always been some kind of rowing machine, but they were kind of big and bulky," K-State coach Jenny Hale said. "The Concept II machine made it possible to compare athlete's times even if they were in different countries. It is also a useful training tool."

The women's crew team will compete on Saturday at one of the indoor rowing competitions that have spread across the nation.

The Midwest Indoor Rowing Championships will be at Allen Fieldhouse at KU.

For this Wildcat fan, even Valentine's Day will not decrease hatred for KU's Hawks

Tomorrow is the day lovers will get together and bask in their love. People will be in the company of only those they love, sickening everyone unfortunate enough to be within earshot of them.

Flowers will be all over the place, making my allergies go crazy. Enormous teddy bears holding hearts suddenly don't look stupid, but only because it's Valentine's Day.

Somebody forgot to tell the Big 12 that on Feb. 14, love prevails over everything else. The KU Jayhawks venture into Bramlage Coliseum, where for 13,500 people, it will no longer be Valentine's Day. No love will be felt in Bramlage.

I have no love for the Jayhawks. I can't root for them, even when they play non-conference teams. I could probably pull for them if they played John Thompson's Georgetown Hoyas, but that's about it. I even rooted for the hated Cornhuskers to beat them in basketball this year.

Part of that comes from being a Wildcat, but I just don't like KU. That's part of the reason I picked K-State. I don't like the people there, even though many of them were my childhood friends.

I don't like the fact that, after the Hawks beat the Cats at Allen Fieldhouse, people were complaining about a win.

I respect Roy Williams. He's a fine coach and runs a clean, quality program, but I just can't like him. I don't like the way he cries like a baby, when whining at officials and at the press conference after losing way too soon at the NCAA Tournament.

Because we don't love KU, it's time to make a difference, as fans, in this game. It likely will be the only Bramlage loss all season long, and we should take advantage of the opportunity to be the sixth man — the extra factor that allows the Cats to beat KU after coming so close last month.

Despite being so close to KSU Stadium, the difference in atmosphere between football and basketball games is huge. The few students who do go to the games aren't really into them. That needs to change, at least tomorrow.

I want to see fans treating the game like it's a football game. When the band plays the Wabash Cannonball, do the dance. Taunt the Jayhawks. Do it vigorously.

My seat in the fourth row behind the KU bench will be perfect for liberally using the words oaf, choker, crybaby, scrub and bum. I will use these words far more than I used "hippie" to mock Texas' Luke Axtell the other night.

When Roy Williams cries to the referees, which is too often, mock him. A collective "Waaaaah" by the student section should do just fine.

When Ryan Robertson, the ultimate scrub, throws up an airball in the first 10 minutes of the game, don't let him touch the ball again without hearing about it. The same goes for anyone who doesn't catch iron.

Mocking the other team's players is part of the game, but try to be civil to the KU fans who make the trip. I have respect for anyone who travels to follow their team, and for the most part, I was treated well on my trip to Allen Fieldhouse last month. However, the many KU fans in the crowd should be drowned out by K-State fans without any problem.

The "overrated" chant has a place in basketball, too. Just be sure to use it after the game is out of hand, and no sooner than that.

Sing the fight song. That is sadly lacking at Bramlage, and even though I hate to admit it, one of the most impressive moments in college basketball is when everybody at Allen Fieldhouse sings the KU alma mater and sways back and forth together. We should have the same atmosphere at Bramlage.

The most important thing is to be loud. We need to make Bramlage, where the Cats have never beaten KU, as much like Ahearn Field House as possible, which means volume.

This can be the year for the Cats.

I beg, just for a few hours, forget it's Valentine's Day. Be as merciless to the Jayhawks as possible, and sway the outcome of the game. The Cats will retake their natural place in the food chain and eat up the Hawks.

Together with the basketball team, we can help make another St. Valentine's Day massacre, K-State style.

Anticipated invasion sparks U.N. warning to aid workers

British pilots deployed on the HMS Invincible, which has been in the Gulf since early last month, intensified training Thursday.

The Clinton administration acknowledges there is less international support now for bombing Iraq than there was during the 1991 Persian Gulf War. Even so, the State Department said its list of countries backing force as a last resort was growing and that countries such as France are hedging publicly to give them more leeway to use diplomacy.

The Russians, however, are making their opposition even more pointed.

Russia's defense minister lectured Defense Secretary William Cohen on Thursday, describing America's stand as rigid and uncompromising.

"For a military man, it is the worst thing to be late, but it's also bad to hurry too much while assessing the situation," Russian Defense Minister Marshal Igor Sergeev said at a joint appearance with Cohen before the two met privately.

As Cohen's assistants looked on in stunned silence, the U.S. defense minister — making his first trip to Moscow as Pentagon chief — asked to respond. Some Russian security guards pushed reporters out of the room before Cohen finished talking.

Cohen expressed doubt over the usefulness of any compromises proposed by Russia to end the weapons inspections standoff.

In Washington, D.C., meanwhile, Secretary of State Madeleine Albright told members of Congress that the ultimate aim of the United States is to oust Hussein.

"Iraq would be better off without Saddam Hussein," she told the House International Affairs Committee, "and we look forward to working with a post-Saddam regime."

She did not offer a scenario for his removal, though she insisted it would not involve American combat troops.

Even U.N. Secretary-General Kofi

Annan admitted diplomacy has a long way to go before a peaceful solution can be found to the crisis.

Annan met for 90 minutes Wednesday with the ambassadors of the United States, Russia, China, France and Britain — the first time permanent members of the Security Council had met together to review the status of negotiations spearheaded by Russia, France and the Arab League.

They agreed to meet with Annan again today.

Annan has been urged by the Russians, French and others to take a leading role in diplomatic efforts to resolve the crisis without a U.S. air strike.

They have asked him to travel to Baghdad to take personal charge of the negotiations.

But Annan has refused to go until he believes negotiations have made substantial progress toward a settlement. "He wants a deal, not a trip," U.N. spokesman Fred Eckhard said Thursday.

With the diplomatic efforts appearing to go nowhere, the U.N. took precautions, ordering 81 of some 400 U.N. relief staffers not to return to Baghdad.

The staff reductions is making it hard to deliver aid to Iraqis suffering under trade sanctions imposed on Iraq in 1990 after the invasion of Kuwait.

The relief is provided to Iraq under an exemption to the U.N. embargo.

The rising tensions have prompted the U.N. to advise aid workers not to spend the night outside of Baghdad — a travel restriction that hurts their ability to make sure food supplies are handed out equitably.

"It is a fact our operations are already affected," Eric Falt, a U.N. spokesman, said.

The United Nations also fears that an American attack might disrupt humanitarian supplies reaching the country under the oil-for-food program, which allows Baghdad to sell $2 billion every six months for humanitarian purposes, Falt said.

Graves appoints Graeber, bypasses Shallenburger

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Gov. Bill Graves on Thursday appointed former state Rep. Clyde Graeber of Leavenworth to replace Sally Thompson as state treasurer, bypassing House Speaker Tim Shallenburger, a declared candidate for the office in this year's elections.

Graeber, 64, who has been one of Graves' liaisons to the Kansas Legislature the past two years, will serve out the final 11 months of Thompson's term.

He reiterated at a news conference in Graves' office announcing his appointment that he will not seek election to the post this year.

Shallenburger, 43, who is in his fourth year as speaker, is the only declared candidate for Republican nomination as state treasurer in the August primary election. Shawnee County Treasurer Rita Cline has said she plans to seek the Democratic nomination to the office.

Shallenburger, of Baxter Springs, had indicated in an interview Wednesday night that he did not expect to be appointed, although he had asked Graves to name him.

The governor also called Graeber "a perfect fit" for the treasurer's job.

He said he considered Shallenburger but did not appoint him because he said "he's a third of the way into the legislative session. The last thing a governor is going to do is disrupt a very smooth session."

Graeber said he plans no changes in the treasurer's office, and he expects about a two-week transition before he fully takes over from Thompson.

Thompson is resigning as state treasurer, after having that office for seven years, to accept President Clinton's appointment as chief financial officer of the U.S. Agriculture Department.

Her appointment was confirmed by the U.S. Senate on Wednesday night.

"Clyde brings a wealth of talent and experience to this task," Graves said in a statement. "I am confident Clyde will perform the duties of the office of state with skill and expertise. I am grateful for his continued service to the people of Kansas."

Graeber said in his prepared statement, "I am honored by the governor's appointment, and grateful for the faith and confidence he has placed in me. I look forward to capping my career in service to my fellow Kansans as state treasurer."

Graeber is the retired president and chief executive officer of Leavenworth National Bank & Trust Co. He has bachelor and law degrees from the University of Tulsa.

Graeber was first elected to the House in 1984. He served 12 years before deciding not to seek re-election in 1996.

His experience as a banker led to his appointment as chairman of its Commercial and Financial Institutions Committee in 1987, in his second two-year term.

He was chairman of that committee for four years.

In 1993 and 1994, he served as chairman of the Federal and State Affairs Committee, which handled social issues, including gambling, abortion and gun control.

Graeber served as chairman of a joint committee on American Indian gambling in 1994 and 1996.

In the Legislature, he was a strong advocate of reimposing the death penalty, and he was a sponsor of the 1994 capital punishment bill that became law without Democratic Gov. Joan Finney's signature.

amendment in the August primary to change the regents system.

The Kansas State Board of Education, which administers kindergarten through 12th-grade education, would retain its duties.

Another commission, which is unnamed, would act as a liaison between the higher education council and the Board of Education.

Rep. David Adkins, R-Leawood, chair of the Select Committee on Higher Education, said in a committee meeting last week that the education council should be an unbiased body.

"People on the council will have to be representative of the whole state. I don't want it to be owned by specific stakeholders, and I see it as a strong coordinating council," Adkins said.

Adkins said input from the regents universities would be welcome, but only through advisory committees to the council.

Conference prepares high school leaders to take on challenges of the next century

KELLY DICKSON
Kansas State Collegian

Making new leaders for a new century was the focus of the Kansas High School Leadership Conference.

"We had a good turnout, a little over 300 students came this morning," said Ryan Kerschen, senior in chemistry and coordinator of the event.

The event was sponsored by the Office of Leadership Programs and Studies and Blue Key Senior Honorary.

The students were welcomed by Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement.

"We opened up with Pat Bosco. He was a wonderful speaker. I heard him last year when he was a group speaker. I really liked him," Pam Rohloff, a senior from Salina South, said.

Rohloff has attended the conference for the past three years.

"I really enjoy coming to the leadership conference every year. Last year was my favorite year, but this year was really good, and it seemed a lot more organized," Rohloff said.

Students went to sessions in the morning that were presented by members of Blue Key.

"Our discussion leaders were really good this year, but they were really good last year. I really liked it because they were enthusiastic about what they were talking about. It is really nice when they are actually excited about getting involved," Rohloff said.

The students ate lunch and listened to football coach Bill Snyder speak about the importance of making good decisions. After lunch, they went to breakout sessions to discuss problems and ideas with students from other schools. The day ended with the keynote speaker Kevin Saunders.

Saunders became paralyzed from the chest down in 1981 while working as a USDA inspector. When a South Texas grain elevator exploded, he was thrown more than 300 feet into a parking lot. After a year in the hospital, he started training as a wheelchair athlete.

He is the first disabled person to serve on the President's Council for Physical Fitness. Saunders also received the Distinguished Alumni Award from K-State in 1995.

He spoke about inspiration and the champion inside of each person.

"Inspiration means to light the light that's inside your soul. That creates enthusiasm which can start to help you make your dreams come true," Saunders said.

He left the leaders for the new century with his message in wire-wrapped holiday lights.

"There is always a way. Never quit."

Judge rejects line-item veto power, sets up Supreme Court showdown

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A federal judge threw out President Clinton's new line-item veto authority Thursday, delivering a blow to a power both Clinton and the Republican Congress said was crucial for limiting wasteful spending. A decisive ruling by the Supreme Court seems likely in the next few months.

U.S. District Judge Thomas F. Hogan said the line-item veto, enacted in 1996 and used for the first time last year, unconstitutionally shifted power to the president from Congress. The measure allows the president to kill individual items in tax and spending bills that otherwise become law, though he can be reversed by two-thirds majorities of the House and Senate.

"The line-item veto act impermissibly crosses the line between acceptable delegations of rulemaking authority and unauthorized surrender to the president of an inherently legislative function, namely, the authority to permanently shape laws and package legislation," Hogan wrote.

Clinton, who called for line-item veto power during his 1992 presidential campaign, said the law has worked well, saving taxpayers more than $1 billion.

"Although I am disappointed with today's ruling, it is my belief that ultimately, the line-item veto will be ruled constitutional by the U.S. Supreme Court," he said.

Numerous congressional proponents of the power also predicted ultimate victory — either at the Supreme Court or in a renewed effort to pass a new version, perhaps as a constitutional amendment. The measure in question was a law, not a constitutional amendment, because proponents could not muster the two-thirds majority needed to change the Constitution.

"We'll fight and win," said Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz.

But others conceded that if there is a next time, there might be less enthusiasm for the power. The approaching age of budget surpluses has made deficit reduction less urgent, and many lawmakers were unhappy last year when Clinton used the power to kill projects in their home districts.

"A lot of the reformist zeal that came in in 1994 hasn't died but has retreated," said Rep. Mark Souder, R-Ind., a line-item-veto supporter.

Souder was elected in 1994, when a constitutional amendment for a line-item veto was part of the Republican "Contract With America."

Opponents of the power rejoiced in Thursday's ruling, including Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., one of six lawmakers who challenged the law's constitutionality last year. Their suit was rejected when a judge ruled they lacked legal standing to bring the case.

"This is a victory for the American people," said Byrd, a fierce defender of Congress' prerogatives. "It is their Constitution, their republic, and their liberties that have been made more secure."

Clinton used the new power 82 times last year, all but twice on spending items, saving a claimed $1.9 billion in the next five years. But those savings represent just 0.0002 percent of the $9 trillion that will be spent over that period.

Hogan's ruling involved two cases brought by victims of the line-item veto law.

One, initiated by New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, sought to restore a part of last summer's budget-balancing bill that would have let New York City and New York state raise taxes on hospitals and use the money to attract additional federal Medicaid payments.

The other was brought by the Snake River Potato Growers of Idaho. A measure in last August's tax bill would have let agricultural refiners or processors defer capital-gains taxes when they sell such facilities to farmers' cooperatives, but Clinton used the line-item veto against it.

It was unclear whether Hogan's ruling immediately restored either of the vetoed items involved in the lawsuits, or for that matter the 80 others Clinton rejected. It was also uncertain whether Clinton could use the line-item veto before the Supreme Court issues a final ruling. White House spokesman Mike McCurry said the administration believes he can.

Last week, the House voted overwhelmingly to restore all 38 vetoed items that Clinton killed in last year's bill financing military construction projects.

A Senate vote is likely the week of Feb. 23, when lawmakers return from a President's Day recess, and senators seem likely to override.

The case will reach the Supreme Court on a rare fast track, allowing immediate access to the high court rather than the usual route through a federal appeals court. Congress included that process in the 1996 law, anticipating such a legal showdown.

DURING "WILL YOU BE MY VALENTINE?" AT THE SUNSET ZOOLOGICAL PARK ON THURSDAY, CHILDREN LEARNED ABOUT THE INTERDEPENDENCIES OF MANY ANIMAL SPECIES. "WILL YOU BE MY VALENTINE?" IS ONE OF SIX PROGRAMS OFFERED FOR CHILDREN AT THE ZOO. JILL JARSULIC Collegian

Zoo delivers educational love note to city

JILL JARSULIC Collegian

TIFFANI BECKMAN, PROGRAM AIDE AT THE SUNSET ZOOLOGICAL PARK, KISSES A LLAMA THURSDAY AFTERNOON WHILE LEADING CHILDREN ON A TOUR OF THE ZOO. THE "WILL YOU BE MY VALENTINE?" CLASS WAS OFFERED THIS WEEK, TEACHING CHILDREN ABOUT THE INTERDEPENDENCIES OF SEVERAL ANIMAL SPECIES.

JERRY A. MOORE
Kansas State Collegian

Valentines come in many shapes and sizes. Children are participating in the "Will You Be My Valentine?" program at the Sunset Zoological Park this week. For two hours, they learn about the many friendships and interdependencies animals sometimes have with each other.

Shaneé Anderson, curator of education at Sunset Zoo, said the session focuses on four aspects of animal relations: understanding the importance of social relationships animals have or choose not to have, learning what friendships help animals survive in the wild, discovering how the animals demonstrate their affection or friendship, and observing animals at the zoo that might be friends.

The children learn why the prairie dog is popular among the animals. Black-footed ferrets depend on prairie dogs as their only source for food, while the burrowing owls and box turtles dwell in vacated prairie dog tunnels, Anderson said.

The program shows how many carnivores such as the cheetah, tiger and snow leopard depend on each other as cubs, but as fierce adult hunters live alone, Anderson said.

The chimpanzees tag along with their troop and bond by grooming each other's hair. "Some people think the chimps pick bugs off one another," Anderson said.

"But in fact, it's a common social behavior, unlike most."

On average, six to seven children attend each class and are taught by a staff person and four volunteers, Anderson said.

Tiffani Beckman, senior in pre-veterinary and assistant education programmer at the zoo, said, "The 'Will You Be My Valentine?' program is a typical class. After greeting the kids, providing name tags and introducing ourselves, we give a presentation on the topic of the day."

The group then takes a tour to visit some of the animals they learned about in class.

"If we talk about big cats like cheetahs, snow leopards and lions in class, then we visit the big cats. If we talk about insects, we'll turn over a large rock," Beckman said.

Eating snacks, playing games and making crafts are also part of the activities that correspond with the lesson as well as asking questions.

"I enjoy teaching the kids," Beckman said, "because they always have thought-provoking questions like 'Do animals miss living out of the wild?' or 'Do animals think people are ugly?'"

Tara Elbl, senior in wildlife biology and an education assistant, has worked with the zoo since fall 1996. She said most of the children who attend the classes are regular visitors, and the amount of information they already know is unbelievable.

"The kids actually teach me, and the best part about the job is that they make me feel like a little kid," Elbl said.

At the end of this class, the children are asked which animal they want for a Valentine buddy.

Goats, pigs and tigers are among the favorites.

In addition to "Will You Be My Valentine?" five additional programs are offered throughout the spring: "Weather Beaters," "Worm Wonders," "April Fools," "Earth Day at Sunset Zoo" and "May Flowers."

Rising to occasion for Valentine's Day just all in day's work for local florists

► MERCHANTS BANKING ON BLOOMING BUSINESS FROM BOUQUET BUYERS.

SHELLY SLATIER
Kansas State Collegian

The staffs of local floral shops are busy ordering, arranging and delivering floral bouquets, traditional work for Valentine's Day.

Kim Reichert, floral assistant at Steve's Floral, said the shop ordered more than 2,000 red roses in order to be ready for Saturday.

"Valentine's Day is still just a typical day at the shop. It's just busier," Reichert said.

Bill Patzell, owner of Manhattan Floral Co., said red roses are by far the most popular flower purchased for Valentine's Day.

"The reason red roses are more popular is because most customers are men, and that is what they think of buying first," Patzell said.

"No one can pass up a beautiful bouquet of red roses."

He said the price of a dozen roses will vary with demand, but for now the Manhattan Floral Co. is selling them for $49, and Reichert said Steve's Floral regular dozen costs $59.50.

At Steve's Floral, orders can be taken over the phone, and the purchase can be charged or placed on a house account.

"We deliver everywhere, and there is a local fee of $3.50 and only a $5 out-of-state service charge," Reichert said.

She said that if by chance, the shop runs out of roses, it would have no problem getting more because they can be delivered within a day or two.

Patzell said he gets flowers from a variety of places such as growing areas in Florida, California, Colorado and imported from Holland and Central America.

"Roses are not the only flowers sold for Valentine's Day," Reichert said.

"We also have beautiful arrangements of lilies, daffodils, tulips, carnations and daisies."

Patzell said different flowers have different life spans.

To keep flowers alive longer, he suggested keeping them in a cool place.

"If a person wants flowers that last a long time, they should choose chrysanthemums or carnations," he said.

"But most people are not concerned with the life span, they just want what's beautiful."

Special meanings found in colors, quantity of roses

SHELLY SLATIER
Kansas State Collegian

According to the Just Roses World Wide Web site, at www.jroscs.com, rose colors have special meanings.

Sending a single red rose simply means "I love you," but sending more than one represents love, respect, passion and courage.

The message for thank you will come across with a deep pink rose, while pink roses send messages of gracefulness, happiness and gentleness.

Light pink roses represent grace, admiration, sweetness and joy.

Messages of purity, silence, charm and secrecy can be sent in white roses, and bridal white roses mean a happy love together.

Orange roses symbolize desire, enthusiasm and fascination, and yellow roses represent joy, friendship and gladness.

To display desire, coral roses should be sent, and to express love at first sight, lavender roses would be appropriate.

By sending a big bouquet of white and red roses together unity is symbolized, and sending a bouquet of roses in full bloom signifies gratitude and represents beauty and perfection.

Black roses are a sign of deep hate and death.

DEAR JACK,

I keep having fantasies about someone I work with. I don't want to date him or anything, but I can't stop having these really detailed dreams about us together. I was thinking about sending him a very special, secret valentine. What do you think?

Sincerely,
Dreaming of love

HE SAYS*DEAR DREAMING,

If you're going to make this move, go all the way. Put your heart, soul and body out there. Don't go just halfway.

And should you be denied, the most important thing you can do is damage control. Say it was a joke. Deny everything. Save your reputation at whatever cost.

GOOD LUCK,
JACK

SHE SAYS*DEAR DREAMING,

Go for it. It's almost spring, human mating season. Go with your natural instincts. But why the secrecy?

Love is grand, and lust is better. Flaunt it.

BEST OF LUCK,
CASSIE

DEAR CASSANDRA,

My roommate has recently begun having lesbian relations with her friend, who now "lives" with us. I don't have a problem with homosexuals, but they are not open about their so-called love for each other. I don't want to lose my roommate, who used to be one of my best friends, but the whole situation makes me uncomfortable. What should I do?

Sincerely,
Three's a crowd
SHE SAYS

DEAR THREE'S A CROWD,

Welcome to the closet.

Get over your discomfort and start charging this new "live-in" rent and utilities.

HE SAYS*DEAR THREE'S A CROWD,

Lesson No. 1: There is no such thing as a crowd when it comes to the bedroom. Ever.

Be happy for your roommate's happiness, and if the situation continues to make you uncomfortable, confront the situation head-on.

Perhaps understanding will only be reached with your participation. Think about it.

PAULINE OKOT-KOTBER, CENTER, AND FATUMA OCHANDA, RIGHT, OWN THE ETHNIQUE BOUTIQUE ON 12TH STREET IN AGGIEVILLE. CARREN OWUOCHE ALSO WORKS IN THE BOUTIQUE, WHICH SELLS AFRICAN CLOTHES, MUSIC AND JEWELRY.

AFRICAN DREAMS

Shop owners want customers to experience culture

Pauline Okot-Kotber said she opened the Ethnique Boutique so people in Manhattan could see the clothes, jewelry and music of Africa.

"We want to keep in touch with our culture, and we want people to know more about our culture, to have an idea about what goes on elsewhere," she said.

Much of the merchandise, such as soapstone carvings and ornately colored two-piece outfits, is from Uganda and Kenya, she said.

"The styles we have are really mainly ideas from west Africa, but they're made in Kenya," she said.

Okot-Kotber and her business partner Fatuma Ochanda, both from Uganda, opened up the boutique about six weeks ago with money from their own pockets rather than with borrowed money. Ochanda said new businesses face the challenge of paying bills without an established customer base.

"It's hard, especially if you haven't taken a loan. Not too many people know about the store," she said.

Coming up with the revenue to open the store wasn't difficult because they already had much of the merchandise with them, Okot-Kotber said.

"What really helped us get started was we already had the things from home, so all we had to do was come up with the rent," she said.

Ochanda said she thinks the store will appeal to a wide variety of people, regardless of their age or race.

"We are not targeting one group of people. We want to bring something for the young, something for the old," she said.

Okot-Kotber said she has seen an increase in customers since the spring semester began.

Students' favorite items so far have been the jewelry, carvings and soapstone sculptures, she said.

Customers also stop in for hair weaves about three times a week. Okot-Kotber said the weaves take anywhere from four to 12 hours per customer, depending on the hair length. The boutique also sells hair pieces and hair-care products.

Okot-Kotber, whose husband works for K-State's Department of Grain Science, hasn't been back to Uganda for almost nine years but hopes to visit someday.

"I really want to go back," she said.

Gerontology center links various ages

SHERYL WILLIAMS
Kansas State Collegian

The Galichia Institute for Gerontology and Family Studies offers services and research for children, families and the elderly.

The institute, north of Justin Hall on Campus Creek Road, was designed to build a bridge between the young and the elderly.

"It is a focus for research, teaching and outreach for extension programming in aging and gerontology, and families," said John Murray, director of the School of Family Studies and Human Services.

The Galichia Institute's building is the result of joining and remodeling two 1940s K-State buildings, Margaret Ahlborn/Ula Dow Cottage and Ellen Richards Lodge.

There are three programs that function within the institute: gerontology and aging, the Family Center and the Early Childhood Laboratory.

The institute's gerontology program helps the elderly continue to live in their homes as they age. The program also provides assistance to help them maintain an independent living environment or make decisions regarding nursing home placement.

Personal Actions to Health, the main gerontology program, provides community programs and assists the elderly with choices about diet and exercise, lifestyles that will improve their health, and following and adding to research into aging and health care issues.

WE CONSIDER OURSELVES AN INCLUSIVE CLASSROOM. THE IDEA BEHIND INCLUSIVE IS THAT CHILDREN BELONG, EVERYBODY BELONGS.

LUANN HOOVER
director of Early Childhood Laboratory

"We're doing some research related to the independence of the oldest old, those who are over 85, in rural Kansas," said Carolyn Wilken, director of the Galichia Institute.

The Family Center, a Marriage and Family Therapy clinic, is another program within the Galichia Institute. Graduate students and faculty see clients regarding marital and family issues such as drugs and alcohol, child-focused issues, adjusting to divorce, step-parenting and loss.

The Family Center provides marriage and family therapy services to K-State, Manhattan and the surrounding communities. Fees are determined by criteria such as income and the number of people in the household.

"I think that our MFT program provides a tremendous opportunity for the community in terms of the therapy services that we are able to provide," said Nancy O'Connor, clinical director of the Family Center.

Other services, such as parenting classes, are also provided by marriage and family therapy graduate students.

The Early Childhood Laboratory, also in the Galichia Institute, provides programming for preschoolers age 3 to 5, including children with special needs.

"We consider ourselves an inclusive classroom. The idea behind inclusive is that children belong, everybody belongs," Luann Hoover, director of the ECL, said.

The lab is equipped with an observation booth for students who are in the early childhood education discipline in Family Studies and Human Services to use. The ECL is open Monday through Thursday to children in the Manhattan community. Maximum classroom sizes for the morning and afternoon sessions range from 10 to 12 people.

There are numerous outreaches and training programs that also originate from the Galichia Institute, such as the Kansas Child Care Training Opportunities and the National Rural Families Conference, both extensions of the Family Center.

Sbarro sales below goals, but management expects improvement

JOHN STOUS
Kansas State Collegian

Sbarro has been open for a week so far, and its management said business will likely pick up soon.

"We have been open for a week and a half and have had pretty good sales," said Paul Stolle, director of food services at Chartwells, the company that oversees food service at the K-State Student Union.

Sales at Sbarro have only met around 60 percent of the restaurant's desired sales budget, but Stolle said it should improve after the actual grand opening Tuesday.

Some students said they have already found Sbarro and like having it in the Union.

"I saw a sign on one of the bulletin boards in the Union about two weeks ago. I wouldn't have even known that it was there otherwise," Ian Spurgeon, senior in history, said. "It's great. It adds another option to students if they're eating on campus."

Since Sbarro opened, its management has had an opportunity to review prices and is working to make them more feasible for students.

"We are working on combo or value meals and have decided to lower the prices on the pastas," Stolle said. "In other Sbarro restaurants the pastas are some of the better sellers, and our sales in that area were not where we thought they should be."

Stolle said Sbarro is also going to try to bring more people into the Union. Since Sbarro opened, Stolle said that almost 45 percent of the sales are from people who usually eat in the Stateroom.

"So far, our weakest time frame is from 3 to 7 p.m.," he said. "We are going to work on bringing more people into the Union at those times."

Stolle said he thinks students will visit Sbarro more once they become aware and make time in their schedules.

"Now, students can eat on campus late in the day, and somehow we need to cut into their traffic patterns and educate them about what we have to offer," he said.

Festival to give more of all that jazz

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

It's bigger. Those two words best describe this year's expanded lineup of jazz offerings on Saturday, said Dennis Wilson, director of the 1998 K-State Jazz Festival.

The Count Basie Orchestra comes back for the third year in a row, bringing trumpet player and special guest Jon Faddis, who is musical director of the Carnegie Hall Jazz Band (in which Wilson plays). The concert, which is sold out, is at 8 p.m. Saturday in McCain Auditorium.

"I met Jon when he was playing with Lionel Hampton," Wilson said. "He was incredible then, and every day he's gotten better. His high registers are what most people are impressed with. He's just got a high standard of musical excellence."

Wilson said he expects the Basie band to feature some romantic ballads because Saturday is Valentine's Day.

The concert finale, which is usually the highlight of the show, will again feature the Basie band and K-State's Concert Jazz Ensemble. It will also spotlight Faddis and a surprise guest. As a hint, the name of the tune, which was penned by Wilson while touring in Italy last fall with the Carnegie band, is "Let Your Voice Sing Out."

The finale also includes a tribute to Dizzy Gillespie, who's this year's honoree.

Bill McFarlin, executive director of the International Association of Jazz Educators, said Faddis has a direct connection to jazz greats such as Dizzy Gillespie. Faddis performed countless times with Gillespie.

"Jon Faddis is one of the most important jazz artists in the world today," McFarlin said. "For Jon to come in and perform with the Basie group, I think that's very historic to have these two on the stage together."

Since last year's festival performance with the New York Voices, the Basie band has won a Grammy Award. Its Manhattan appearance is one of the first few on the beginning of its next tour.

The orchestra debuted in Kansas City in 1935 and has more or less defined jazz music since, especially with its contribution to the idea of a Kansas City sound. It has recorded extensively over the years with the likes of Ella Fitzgerald, Frank Sinatra, Sarah Vaughn, Joe Williams and Tony Bennett. Directed by Grover Mitchell, the group features 19 members and tours worldwide every year.

The festival has been expanded this year to include an invitation-only reception to benefit the Matt Betton Jazz Scholarship Fund tonight at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

This year also marks the second year for involvement by Yamaha Electronics. Tony Escueta will offer an electronic music demonstration, similar to last year.

The festival has grown so much in its four-year history that more than 25 schools are participating this year. That amounts to almost 600 high school, junior-high and college-age students coming to K-State on Saturday.

Jena Pralle, senior in music education and assistant to Wilson, said the Basie orchestra is good about making each concert count for the students in the audience.

"No matter how many times they've played, they know someone in the audience is hearing it for the first time," Pralle said.

Pralle plays bass for the Concert Jazz Ensemble and is looking forward to performing again with the Basie band.

"The freshmen in the band right now have no idea what to expect," Pralle said.

Jazz festival

The following is a list of activities that are going on during the K-State Jazz Festival. A $5 button admits people to all events. The buttons can be purchased in the lobby of McCain Auditorium.

9 a.m. Breakfast Jazz and Donuts featuring the K-State Monday Jazz Combo in the McCain Auditorium atrium.

9:30 a.m. Electronic music session No. 1 featuring Yamaha specialist Tony Escueta in McCain 135.

10 a.m. K-State Jazz Lab A in the McCain lobby.

Noon Historical lecture series: "The Real Dizzy Gillespie" followed by the Jon Faddis clinic, "History of the Jazz Trumpet", in Union Forum Hall.

1 p.m. Autograph session with the Count Basie Orchestra in the Union Courtyard. There also will be a performance by the K-State Jazz Quintet.

3:50 p.m. Awards concert featuring the Concert Jazz Ensemble with Willie Hill, Lisa Hittle and Mike Parkinson in Forum Hall.

MIKE ENGELHARDT/Collegian

Free jazz

For the past two years, members of the Basie band have been sitting in with local band Wasted Potential at Auntie Mae's Parlor on the night before the concert. However, the band won't be in town this year until Saturday.

Instead, Jon Faddis, director of the Carnegie Hall Jazz Band, will be sitting in for an hour or so after 10 p.m. As a special request, Mae's will be smoke-free during the performance. Expect a small cover charge of a dollar or so.

Unlike previous years, there will be no public jam session after Saturday's concert. The jazz program is sponsoring a private party for members of the Basie band at a local restaurant.

Theater's midnight show strictly made for lovers of violent films, death

CHRIS DEAN
Kansas State Collegian

Single for Valentine's Day? Would seeing another human being incinerated make you feel better?

Seth Child 6 Cinema is having midnight showings of "Faces of Death Part 4" tonight and Saturday.

"Faces of Death" is the controversial series that shows brutal assaults, fatal accidents and staged deaths. The original film was released in 1978 and was banned in more than 40 countries for its gratuitous violence. The original has spawned five sequels and "Worst of Faces of Death." Only one video store in Manhattan, Video Express, carries the series.

"Part 4," released in 1990, includes the standard collection of staged and real footage. It includes a cremation, bungee jumping fatalities and a man being drawn and quartered.

"Carmike has shown this series in a lot of different theaters," Carmike

Cinema's city manager Bob Howard said. "It's pretty gory, which is why no one under 17 will be allowed in."

The movie is not rated, but Howard said it is worse than the standard R-rated movie.

"It's obviously more than an R movie but not X-rated at all," Howard said. "In this case, we are just going with company policy."

To enforce the policy, everyone attending the show will be checked for ID, and police officers will be on hand.

Although the showing was meant for Friday the 13th, Carmike Cinema's city manager Bob Howard said he was not sure how the Valentine's Day holiday would affect attendance.

"Not having shown these movies before, I don't know what kind of audience comes to them or how Valentine's Day will affect it," he said. "Because it's at midnight and not an early showing, I don't think it would be mistaken as a date movie."

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

VOL. 102 No. 97

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1998

COLLEGIAN.KSU.EDU

Board's vote reverses decision to dismiss director

TIM RICHARDSON
Kansas State Collegian

The Board of Student Publications unanimously passed a motion that effectively reversed a previous vote to vacate the position of Director Ron Johnson.

During a Sunday meeting, the board discussed clarifications of the actions it took during its Feb. 4 meeting when it declared Johnson's office of director of Student Publications Inc. vacant. Both the Feb. 4 motion and the new motion were made by board member Barry Flinchbaugh.

The vote called for establishing a review procedure of Johnson to be completed by May 1.

Board member Carlton Getz said during an interview that the review likely likely be a general evaluation, looking at his performance with the Collegian, interaction with student groups, and possibly, management aspects.

JOHNSON

"He's a great adviser. He works really well with the Collegian," he said.

"Beyond that, it's really determinant on what the evaluation comes up with."

The motion said the evaluation will use input from students, faculty and other interested parties. Johnson's contract will then be signed by Student Publications and the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications.

As part of the passed motion, a review process will be formulated to use on an annual basis.

Board member Bill Feyerherm said during the meeting that once-political actions are now more contractual.

He said the contract should compensate Johnson at least until the end of the year.

"I think it should run its course, the same way it has all year," he said.

Johnson, who has been director for nine years, receives half of his salary from the board and the other half as a part-time instructor at the university. When it declared Johnson's position vacant last week, the board ruled to deny him the $33,249 he receives annually from Student Publications. Sunday's meeting reversed that decision.

Getz said the vote assures that Johnson will receive the full amount of his salary.

"It makes sure that everyone who is in their current positions receives the salary they are guaranteed," Getz said.

Getz said the board has the legal responsibility to review the contract itself and sign on its own behalf, rather than through the College of Arts and Sciences. Johnson's contract was written and signed by the dean of arts and sciences when Johnson was hired as director.

Board Chairman Todd Simon said during the meeting that it is a common practice to have separate contracts with an organization other than the university. He said many universities have a board separate from the university, and that K-State could use those other universities as an example.

Board member and Collegian representative Kevin Klassen said during an interview that contract changes will be minimal, as the contracts will be signed by the board and the journalism school as they are now.

"He is fulfilling his duties as director of Student Publications as his contract specifies," he said.

The contracts of Associate Director Gloria Freeland and Assistant Director Linda Puntney will also be reviewed. The initial vote had not specified contract reviews for either of them.

Klassen said the initial vote to vacate the position of director stemmed directly from Johnson's performance at a Privilege Fee Committee meeting in the fall. Some members were offended by remarks made by Johnson after an error caused a $120,000 loss to Student Publications.

Student Publications, which publishes the Collegian, Royal Purple yearbook and Campus Directory, is a separate entity from the university but uses some student fees.

Klassen said that with a favorable evaluation, there is no reason why Johnson's contract will not be renewed.

"If his past performance is indicative of what the future will be like, he will continue to qualify alumni to work as professional journalists," he said.

SMOOTH GROOVES

DURING LATINO NIGHT ON FRIDAY NIGHT AT UNION STATION, DARIO NARVAEZ-CORRALES, DOCTORAL STUDENT IN PLANT PATHOLOGY, AND TABU KAZEZE, SENIOR IN SPANISH, DANCE TO LATIN TUNES. HISPANIC AMERICAN LEADERSHIP ORGANIZATION SPONSORED THE EVENT.

Latino Night offers new flavor to Union social scene

It's Friday night, and Aaron, Gino and Samuel are playing pool. But as soon as the women arrive, they put down their pool sticks and head toward the dance floor.

No, it's not another night in Aggieville. It's Latino Night at Union Station.

The Hispanic American Leadership Organization has Latino Night once every two months, Willie Torres, former HALO president, said.

"We have it to bring everybody together and play some music," he said.

The colorful lights flashing over the dance floor and the variety of Spanish music draws a diversity of people to Latino Night.

Gino Zanin, a student from the American Institute of Baking, came with his friends.

"These guys are all my buddies, and they told me about it. I don't have a Valentine's date, so I came here," Zanin said.

Zanin said he had a great time at Latino Night.

"I haven't danced like that since I've been in Chicago," he said. "I'm definitely coming back the next time there is a Latino Night."

Aaron Levine, another student from the baking institute, said he enjoyed the evening.

"I had a very good time. It was my first Latino Night, and I really liked it," Levine said. "I plan to go back the next time there is one. I know a lot of people there now, so I'll feel more comfortable."

Samuel Navarro, a junior in mechanical engineering and from Mexico, said he came for the music and dancing.

After the women arrived, Navarro was soon on the floor dancing and teaching others to dance to the Latino music.

"My favorite dance is the Cumbia and quebradita. They're to Mexican music. I also like the salsa and merengue," he said.

Elda Pecina, a senior in sociology, said she came to be with her friends.

"They are a part of my family, and I enjoy the night," she said.

"I try to keep myself cultured. I'm Mexican-American, and I just try to get a flavor of every kind of Latino music."

HALO welcomes anyone who wants to attend Latino Night, but newcomers better watch out because if they aren't dancing, someone will pull them on the dance floor.

Committee plan to restructure regents system

KELLEE MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

President Jon Wefald called the initial report for the $138 million restructuring of higher education in Kansas a Herculean effort allowing K-State to advance and compete in the 21st century.

However, skepticism was high from the audience Friday in Hale Library's Hemisphere Room.

The report, presented by the Select Committee on Higher Education, would abolish the Kansas Board of Regents and bring Kansas' six regents universities and all state community and technical colleges under the control of the proposed Kansas Council on Postsecondary Education, if approved by the Kansas Legislature. The report also recommends making Topeka's Washburn University a full state university.

This meeting at K-State was the first at a regents university in the committee's scheduled tour throughout the state to gain responses from postsecondary schools. Committee Chair David Adkins said the feedback from these visits would be used to help develop a final report.

"This is not an indictment of the current system," he said. "We have taken the current system and made it better."

Elizabeth Stevens, president of Highland Community College, read a statement from the community college presidents, calling the plan a visionary framework that would foster increased excellence in postsecondary institutions.

Charles Hostetler, former member of the Board of Regents, was less than enthusiastic in his response. He said the board should not be blamed for the lack of adequate funding from the Legislature, and the combining of all the schools would be a tremendous detriment to the regents schools.

"We have six hungry children, and we are about to adopt a seventh and add 19 stepchildren," he said.

Hostetler said there has been a consistent pattern of underfunding from the Legislature for years, and the board cannot defend themselves when the Legislature won't fund more properly.

"The committee should make some changes, but not redo everything," he said.

Several professors were concerned how all the different colleges could fit together when each have different needs.

Ranking minority committee member Ed McKechnie said the committee would preserve the strong elements in each college, while building resources to enhance the weaker elements.

Committee member Jim Garner said the unification of all postsecondary schools in the state would help the long-term goals of higher education.

"It's a unified voice," he said. "Right now we are pitting institutions against each other."

Adkins said the plan was the first commitment to all schools and is student-centered to give students world-class educational opportunities. He said the committee respects the missions of each school.

"It's one voice for higher education," Adkins said. "KSU will excel in research, technology and arts and sciences."

The report also addresses the need for faculty salaries to become more competitive and promises a raise of 95 percent of peer institution salaries. K-State is one of the lowest-ranked among land grant universities and in the Big 12 in terms of faculty salaries, Hostetler said.

James Legg, president of Faculty Senate at K-State, said that even if the salary increase was delivered, it would not ensure long-range Legislature commitment.

"We need more than a two-year or four-year commitment," he said. "We need an ongoing commitment."

The committee also promised to decrease the salary gap between Washburn and the other regents universities in two years.

Elizabeth Dodd, associate professor in English, said she came to K-State during the third year of the Margin of Excellence salary enhancement plan. That same year, legislators reneged on their commitment. Dodd questioned what would happen if the economy would fall, making the pool of legislative money available for the increases smaller.

Adkins proposed that the plan would be written in such a way that would guarantee the Legislature would follow through, even

U.N. hopes maps will simplify Iraqi weapons inspections

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — A U.N. team began mapping Iraq's presidential compounds Sunday, attempting to help resolve one of the main disputes in the crisis over U.N. inspections of suspected weapons sites, Iraqi sources said.

The teams are not actually investigating the compounds, which Iraq has said are off limits to U.N. weapons inspectors. Instead, U.N. officials hope to use the maps to determine which areas of the sprawling compounds are legitimate targets for inspections and which areas should remain closed.

Iraq has said unrestricted inspections would violate its national sovereignty.

The United States, which has threatened military action against Iraq if it does not open the compounds to inspectors, did not immediately comment on the map-making team.

But Iraq called the development a "positive step," and warned that a U.S. military strike could destroy a well functioning U.N. monitoring system of suspected weapons sites.

"The military attack would practically destroy the system, which relies on communications, cameras," Gen. Amir al Sa'adi, an Iraqi presidential adviser said.

He also denied claims that Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz ever described presidential palaces as "absolutely forbidden." The claim was made earlier Sunday by the chief U.N. weapons inspector, Richard Butler, in a CNN interview.

WORLDREPORT

No deadline set for Iraq to back down; senators asking for Congressional vote

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Sen. John McCain said it's time for President Clinton to set a deadline for Saddam Hussein to back down or face U.S. military might. Other lawmakers insisted Sunday the president not act without a vote of support from Congress, which is on vacation next week.

"The president's got to set a deadline, and Saddam Hussein has to understand it," said McCain, R-Ariz., a senior member of the Senate Armed Services Committee. He said on "Fox News Sunday" that the standoff — threats by the United States to use force unless Hussein gives unconditional access to U.N. weapons inspectors — gives Iraqi President Hussein an equal place in the world forum and continues to erode the United States' credibility. Defense Secretary William Cohen, appearing on ABC's "This Week with Sam and Cokie," said a specific deadline is not needed because "Saddam Hussein knows he's been in violation of his obligation for some time now." The president, Cohen said, will decide if and when diplomacy has failed.

White House National Security Adviser Sandy Berger, on NBC's "Meet the Press," said the administration has been very careful not to set an artificial deadline. Repeating what other administration officials have said in recent weeks, he said the timeline for commencing military action is "not measured in days, but it's also not measured in months."

With Russia, France, China and other nations openly opposed to military strikes, the administration continued to campaign for international backing. Clinton talked Sunday with the prime ministers of Austria and Belgium and the emirs of Bahrain and Kuwait to coordinate Iraqi policy, White House officials said.

Other lawmakers on the Sunday news programs said military strikes should at least wait until Congress returns Feb. 23 from its Presidents Day recess and passes a resolution supporting military action. Differences over the language of such a resolution stopped Senate and House action last week.

"An attack would be an act of war," Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said on Fox. "And only the Congress has the authority to authorize that."

NATIONAL NEWS

Starr criticized for role in investigation by both Republican, Democrat senators

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A Republican senator said Sunday the Monica Lewinsky investigation should have been handled by someone other than Kenneth Starr because too many Americans "think he's out to get the president."

A Democratic senator said Starr's ethics should be investigated in Congress.

"I think it would have been smarter had the attorney general, looking at the many years of Starr's involvement and the public perception, which is adverse to Starr ... let someone else come in," Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said.

"Many people think he's out to get the president, and you have this adverse public reaction to Starr," said Specter, appearing on "Fox News Sunday."

Specter's comments came as Lewinsky's lawyer, William Ginsburg, continued harsh criticism of Starr for alleged leaks of information to the news media in the investigation of an alleged presidential affair. The latest revelation involves Lewinsky's supposed e-mails to friend Linda Tripp, mentioning Lewinsky's unnamed boyfriend, whom she referred to as "the Big Creep," and his wife "Babba."

"All of this goes to this campaign of leaks," Ginsburg said on CNN's "Late Edition." "This particular investigative group under Mr. Starr has managed to trample, and I mean totally trample, on Ms. Lewinsky's fourth, fifth, sixth and 14th Amendment rights" and the e-mails are "just more of the same."

Court allows Missouri citizens to gamble over Internet with Indian tribe in Idaho

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Missouri gamblers can't be barred from an Idaho American Indian tribe's Internet and telephone lottery games, a federal judge has ruled.

Missouri Attorney General Jay Nixon had sued the Coeur d'Alene tribe when it began offering the games on a trial basis last year.

He sued again last month when the games went national, and Madison County Circuit Court Judge Stanley J. Murphy granted a temporary restraining order barring the tribe from accepting bets from Missouri.

On Thursday, a federal judge in Cape Girardeau, overruled the ruling at the tribe's request.

A spokesman for Nixon said Friday that the attorney general would appeal the federal judge's ruling. Nixon contends the tribal games are illegal in Missouri because they are not licensed or regulated by the state.

The tribe, which had complied with the circuit court's ban, argues that state officials have no authority to intervene in games approved by federal Indian-gaming regulators.

Willie Nelson teams up with Kickapoos to start satellite country music network

HORTON, Kan. — Willie Nelson, in his trademark braids and cowboy hat, sang two songs and signed autographs for a crowd gathered at Golden Eagle Casino to celebrate the premier of Nelson's new TV network dedicated to country music and Native American heritage.

"Thank the Great Spirit for cowboys and Indians coming together today to celebrate the Outlaw Music Channel," Nelson said Saturday as he celebrated the 24-hour satellite TV network's first day on the air.

Nelson has talked about starting a country music network for several years, but didn't have the financial resources until he teamed up with the Kickapoo tribe of Kansas late last year.

The Kickapoos are providing the startup funds for CNI using proceeds from their Golden Eagle Casino.

"This is exactly what the Indian Gaming Act was supposed to do," said Gov. Bill Graves' Indian liaison, Brad Hamilton. "This tribal council has had the foresight to develop something that will be here for those generations who are on the way."

The tribe led the way in bringing Las Vegas-style gambling to Kansas, and now it is the first to use proceeds from a casino to create a long-term business venture, said Kickapoo tribal chairwoman Nancy Bear.

The network, which began broadcasting at 12:01 a.m. Feb. 14, sold more than 4,000 subscriptions in less than 24 hours on the air, Bear said.

The Outlaw Music Channel will show a mix of country music shows from the 1960s and 1970s featuring the early years of many of today's country music stars, including Nelson, Dolly Parton, George Jones, Conway Twitty and the Judds.

'Titanic' tops box office for 9th weekend becoming No. 3 all-time grossing film

LOS ANGELES — "Titanic" replaced "Jurassic Park" as the No. 3 all-time domestic moneymaker while topping the nation's box office for a ninth weekend, according to industry estimates Sunday.

The blockbuster, which earned a record-tying 14 Academy Award nominations, beat out a trio of new films. It grossed $27.5 million for a North American total of $370.9 million, Exhibitor Relations Co., Inc. reported.

"Jurassic Park," with $357.1 million, drops to No. 4 on the all-time list.

"Titanic" now only trails behind "Star Wars," which earned $461 million, and "E.T. The Extra-Terrestrial," with $399.8 million.

Senator concerned about funding for library's new Uncover database

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

As discussions of a student privilege fee for Hale Library mature, some student senators have expressed concern about some of the library's funding practices.

The funding in question stems from a Dec. 10, 1997, memo to all K-State faculty, staff and graduate students from Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock. In the memo, Hobrock explains how all Uncover database search-and-retrievals of articles will be subsidized up to $25 per article.

The Uncover service was offered beginning Jan. 2. Searching the Uncover database — which covers the disciplines of science, medicine, business, arts, social sciences and humanities — remains free to all students and faculty.

Jamie Wetig, junior in secondary education and a student senator, said before last week's Senate meeting he thought that before a student fee could be passed, students needed to know what they were paying for. He said a student fee, which is being discussed at a level of $300,000, might be paying for services that money from these exclusive Uncover costs could redress.

"If faculty and staff are getting these journals for free and students have to pay for them, how can they afford it?" Wetig said. "How can the library afford to pay for journals for certain people?"

Wetig said he became aware of the Uncover service through a professor and graduate student assistant. Privilege fees are paid by both undergraduates and graduate students.

"Maybe colleges should have an account so the colleges pay for them instead of the library," Wetig said.

The Dec. 10 memo also states that graduate students and faculty can access citations from nearly 17,000 journals from their desktops and then request the entire article be sent to them. While most articles are faxed within 24 to 48 hours, an express option allows some articles to be faxed within one hour. Uncover articles can be secured through interlibrary loans for free, but it can take a few days to have it delivered.

Hobrock said Uncover is a mediated service, which means all requests are coordinated by library staff.

The Uncover subsidy was proposed by the October report filed by the Funding the Library for the 21st century task force. The task force identified $50,000 in university reserves that could subsidize Uncover retrievals until June 30, 1998.

HOW CAN THE LIBRARY AFFORD TO PAY FOR JOURNALS FOR CERTAIN PEOPLE?

JAMIE WETIG
junior in secondary education

Hobrock said the $50,000 is new money for the library, but it comes out of money other departments at K-State could have used. He said when July 1 rolls around, the library will have to fund Uncover subsidies through new money.

Undergraduates are allowed to use this service, Hobrock said, although he said a potential for abuse exists.

"If we turn 20,000 students loose with no limits, how can you make sure it's justified?" Hobrock said.

He said a student fee could pay for undergraduate Uncover costs, and a special fee money account could be tapped. However, he said asking faculty to pay for these costs wouldn't make sense.

"The faculty see themselves as paying for this anyway through departmental expectations," Hobrock said. "Some of this new money is money that would have been sent to the departments for their use. It's just a matter of passing money from one pocket to another."

Although taking indirect research overhead from departments could help meet this need, Hobrock said new money sources matter the most.

"It's just a shell game unless it's new money," he said. "When you take money from one area you simply damage that area. Everyone starts pointing fingers when you don't have money."

Rules might exclude minorities

ADMISSION REQUIREMENTS MAY KEEP BLACK STUDENTS FROM ATTENDING COLLEGE.

JON KURCHE
Kansas State Collegian

New guidelines in K-State admissions will have a negative effect on minority students who wish to enter college, panel members said on Saturday.

The panel, "The Impact of Affirmative Action and the Regents 2001 Guidelines," discussed the guidelines passed last year that will eliminate open admissions policies of Kansas schools.

The high school class of 2001 will need to meet minimum requirements upon graduating high school in order to attend a state university.

The old policy in Kansas, known as open admissions, allowed all students to attend a state institution, provided they graduate from a Kansas high school.

John Exdell, associate professor of philosophy and panel member, said closing admissions might have a negative effect on minority students.

"We already have a problem in Kansas with minority participation in higher education," Exdell said.

"It looks as if this new policy will even make that tradition worse."

According to a study released by Mike Lynch, assistant vice president for educational and personal development, of the 144 black students who entered K-State this fall, only 97 would be qualified under the Regents 2001 guidelines.

The study also said excluding the 55 students above the age of 21 and transfer students, only 35 percent of black students who now attend K-State would be admissible out of high school under qualified admissions.

Neither figure includes students who might be eligible by the core classes guideline because there was no record available.

Clyde Howard, director of affirmative action at K-State and a panel member, described the effort to raise admissions standards as an action to better prepare students.

"It became a part of state law," Howard said. "For a number of years, legislators became concerned about high schoolers who were ill prepared for college."

Omar Davis, senior in psychology, attended the discussion and said he thought the requirements are reasonable.

"I think it would be doing every student a disservice not to come to K-State prepared enough to meet these requirements," Davis said.

"I'm not saying everyone is going to get a 21 on their ACT, but you can at least achieve a 2.0."

Panel member Juanita McGowan, assistant professor of sociology, anthropology and social work, said she thought that if the problem was with student preparedness, the way to solve it was not by qualifying admissions.

"The reason we have this change in policy is to address unprepared students in Kansas," McGowan said. "If we have unprepared students in Kansas, what do we do? Raise our standards? Would raising standards solve that problem?"

Other members of the panel included Lawrence Moeder, director of student financial assistance; Larry Hackney, equal employment opportunities specialist for the city of Manhattan; Dawn Anderson, associate director for affirmative action at K-State and moderator of the panel; and Mordean Taylor-Archer, associate provost and professor of diversity and dual career development.

Taylor-Archer said she thought the current status of minority students in Kansas schools was troubling.

"My point is that there are other things which may affect a student's performance in the classroom. We know that the playing field is not level, therefore all of us need to take a stand in social justice," Taylor-Archer said.

Where affirmative action plays its role, McGowan said, is in giving everyone similar chances.

"We already have a problem in Kansas with minority participation in higher education. It looks as if this new policy will even make that tradition worse," McGowan said.

McGowan said she thought the solution started with students and their families.

"I think we need to get the message out," McGowan said. "We need to empower students and parents to form a partnership to get the message out because what's going to happen here, we're going to need to educate ourselves."

Aggieville fire destroys location of memories

Buildings were destroyed and damaged in Saturday's early morning fire, but something more meaningful was lost.

Something intangible — the way the destroyed buildings helped frame the environment of historic Aggieville, and the way K-Staters will remember it years from now.

This is a tragic aspect of the Aggieville fire.

The bar, restaurant and stores where memories were made for countless K-Staters and members of the Riley County community went up in smoke. Thankfully, no people were killed or injured in the fire.

However, students who met their mate or danced the mambo on the second floor of Club Karrington, or whatever it was called at the time, can never walk those steps again.

The table where you sat during a first date at Greek's Pizzeria, as well as all tangible reminders of a late-evening conversation at Speed Wash Laundry or of a spring break planned through Adventure Travel, are gone.

Owners, managers and employees of the businesses have also lost a livelihood. Small businesses and a strong local economy are the heart of a thriving community.

Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association, had the right idea. The association and local businesses should pull together and help one another.

When businesses within a community are damaged or destroyed, the entire community suffers a blow.

Other businesses sustained various levels of damage from smoke and water. Pizza Hut, Varsity Theatre, On the Wild Side and The Futon Store have all suffered damage from the fire.

Patrons of the historic district should be patient and understanding during the cleanup and the rebuilding period that will, with any luck, follow.

THE BLAME GAME

In a nation founded by immigrants and strengthened by diversity, one group continues to be singled out.

I have always been convinced that immigrants make positive contributions for the common good. My concern has not been about legal immigration, but rather how illegal immigrants have been targeted by the United States' newest laws. Illegal immigrants, especially Latino immigrants, are often treated as second-class citizens who are usually vulnerable to exploitation. This exploitation has been clearly delivered toward all Latinos in recent years with such laws as English Only and California's Proposition 187.

The push for English Only has been suggested for the sole purpose to have English as America's official language. It seems its hidden agenda has to do with English becoming more and more uncommon. However, immigrants know in order to survive in America, English must be learned. It is the language of communication used in the workplace and in American society. The places where English is not used are usually in the home or where there is a high concentration of immigrants.

Sometimes immigrants do not have to communicate using English because in their workplaces they are the majority. In this situation their native language is more commonly used. These jobs are the jobs Americans do not want to do, so immigrants accept them. Such industries where high numbers of immigrants tend to work are meat slaughterhouses, factories, railroads and farms.

A common belief among lawmakers and the public is that immigrants are lazy and unwilling to work. However, the reason they immigrate from countries such as Mexico because they are underdeveloped economically. Therefore, many immigrants are crossing the borders in search of work. Latino immigrants come to the United States because they are looking for better opportunities of employment, better wages and a better way of life.

The politics of immigration touch feelings of frustration and anger within me because so many Americans see immigrants as a source of many of America's problems and use immigrants as scapegoats. It seems U.S. citizens blame immigrants for the economic struggles many U.S. citizens have endured. Some people go so far as to blame the economy, the number of welfare recipients, lack of jobs and low wages on immigrant workers.

Immigration seems to be a problem here in the United States, because politicians and worried citizens believe there is a "taking over" by immigrants, more so per se by Latino immigrants. In addition, the negative aspects are more publicized than the positive contributions immigrants have made, including helping to build this country.

Yes, in terms of social problems that we now face and have to deal with, there is a crisis here in America. The crisis, however, is not immigration. Immigrants did help to build this country and now lawmakers and some Americans would like for America to close its borders and export all illegal immigrants back to their countries.

The problem seems not to be about ecology — where people are concerned about overcrowding, not enough food, poverty or illiteracy — but rather a fear of a culture, a people and a language they do not understand, and in some cases, do not want to understand. After all, many still want America to be a melting pot where assimilation into America's beliefs and language should be the dominating ingredients.

Immigrants have traditionally been accepted in America. Sooner or later, they have become assimilated into the mainstream and evolve into citizens — every bit as hard-working, law-abiding and loyal as earlier immigrants. Exactly the same pattern is characterized by Latino immigrants.

They, too, have taken their place in America's society along with the rest of us, as people who work hard and assume their share of responsibilities for maintaining a stable and prosperous country. In the past few years, however, too many Americans have failed to realize that this great land of ours was built by the sweat of many, many exploited people and cultures.

I am outraged that California seems to think far too many Latinos and other immigrants are taking too much from the U.S. social system and not giving enough back. With this in mind, legislators, with the support of California residents, passed a law a few years ago known as Proposition 187. What this did was take away health care and education privileges from undocumented immigrants and their children. The idea that Latinos and other immigrants were abusing the system led to such a law.

I have come to the conclusion that we must continue to extend, as always, an open-armed welcome to all immigrants, among them the one million Latin immigrants projected to enter the United States in the 1990s. The issue is clear: Immigration that is legal should be welcomed. Illegal immigration should be controlled, along with the corporations and businesses who continue to hire illegal immigrants or move across the south border unquestioned.

The very nature of the problem is a menace to the United States, but the focus and blame so far has only been on Latino immigrants.

Persuasion becoming powerful form of art

Last Thursday, I and about 10 other K-State students spent the day at the Statehouse. The purpose of missing a day of higher education was to attend State Education Day.

State Education Day involves students representing each Kansas Board of Regents institution (K-State, University of Kansas, Wichita State University, Pittsburg State University, Emporia State University and Fort Hays State University) who go to Topeka to meet with legislators and discuss issues that pertain to them.

This year the two issues students supported were the addition of funds for the newly consolidated Kansas Grant Program and for technology. The day is labeled State Education Day to sound politically correct but in essence, we lobbied for money and the dollar amount was much greater than what most students lobby parents for.

Lobbying is more than persuasion. It is selling an idea to a nonbeliever and reaffirming that idea with a believer. While walking up and down stairs in uncomfortable shoes for eight hours, I realized two things about the art of lobbying: 1) it is hard work, and 2) the results are never guaranteed until the end.

There is an art in selling an idea. I have seen people who are so good they could convince tobacco farmers that smoking is hazardous and sell ice to the Eskimos. They do not win by telling people they have been wrong in the past. Instead, they show ways of doing things better. By being sincere and passionate, people can sell ideas so it allows the former nonbeliever to actually make the decision for themselves.

However, when people try to sell their ideas with condescension and act like pompous know-it-alls, people feel about as tall as a toothpick.

People who lobby for a living have a thankless job. In government, they visit with legislators, providing them with information, testifying before committees and then praying while the votes are counted to see if victory was achieved. A lobbyist must know as much as possible about individuals' beliefs to decide who to approach and how to approach them.

For example, if I represented a group that wanted a constitutional amendment supporting that all transportation systems but the airplane should be eliminated, I probably would not win any votes from legislators who work for Ford Motor Co. Plus, a lobbyist has to be a master at small talk. From my experiences, I have had to discuss topics ranging from Monica Lewinsky to the defensive football line at KU, two topics I wish would go away.

Besides the normal "go and visit the person with the power and ask them for a vote," I have seen many interesting examples of how people sell their ideas. An obvious one would be the Civil Rights movement, when people had sit-ins at restaurants to get rid of segregated public places.

Last fall, the JumboTron flashed interviews of K-State football players and Dick Vitale during games to lobby students to vote for stadium expansion.

To address emotional issues such as abortion, I have seen people read passages from the Bible and debate against abortion with their children beside them, asking the audience, "Would you want to kill these children?" However emotional or important an issue is to a particular person, there will never be a consensus on everything. That is what makes life interesting, and no matter what people think, we will all get into heaven eventually.

Artist admittedly not worthy of "master" title

Editor,

While I would be glad to possess the skills associated with the title "senior master scientific glassblower," at four years of experience I am not there yet. I am working hard to master the craft, but the appellation "master" is usually applied to someone with many years of experience who has succeeded in meeting the many and diverse challenges scientific glassblowing has to offer.

Our former university glassblower, Mitsugi Ohno, was truly a master glassblower. Until I have developed my skills with more years of work and practice, it would be a disservice to Ohno to put us in the same class.

Earnhardt finally wins Daytona

Dale Earnhardt won the Daytona 500 on Sunday in his 20th try, with 185,000 spectators standing and screaming in tribute to the stock car great who captured the race he wanted more than any other. "Unbelievable," exclaimed team owner Richard Childress after Earnhardt ended a 59-race winless string, the longest of his illustrious career, with the biggest of his 71 victories.

Halfway down pit road, the 46-year-old driver rode his black No. 3 Chevrolet onto the tri-oval grass, between the pit lane and the front straight, etching a number three in the grass with a pair of joyous donuts.

"Yes! Yes! Yes!" Earnhardt said before turning to hug crew chief Larry McReynolds. "We won it! We won it! We won it!"

Some of the seven-time Winston Cup champion's crewmen cried openly as they returned to the garage area, their driver having at long last captured the richest and most prestigious NASCAR race.

Earnhardt dedicated the victory at the beginning of NASCAR's 50th anniversary season to three people especially close to him, among them T. Wayne Robertson, the head of series sponsor Winston's sports marketing group. He was killed last month in a boating accident.

"This is for T. Wayne, Neil and Ralph Earnhardt, all those people up there who kept me in front," Earnhardt said.

Neil Bonnett was Earnhardt's closest friend in racing. He was killed in 1994 while practicing for the Daytona 500. Earnhardt's late father, Ralph, was an early NASCAR star who died before his son became a racing star.

Harry Caray hospitalized

RANCHO MIRAGE, Calif. — Harry Caray, the beloved Chicago Cubs broadcaster known for his exuberant "Holy cow!" collapsed at a nightclub while having a Valentine's Day dinner with his wife.

Caray, 78, was listed in critical but stable condition Sunday at Eisenhower Medical Center. Hospital spokesperson Jim Ellis said Caray's wife, Dutchie, asked that no further details be released.

Caray's stepdaughter, Tunie Wells, said doctors said he definitely did not have a stroke.

Dutchie Caray told WGN radio that her husband collapsed Saturday night after he leaned on a table that gave way. Wells told Chicago radio station WMAQ that Caray put his hand on the table when he stood to acknowledge the crowd after someone pointed out he was in the restaurant.

"He simply put his hand on the table, probably just for balance, and the table was not secured, and it came up and knocked him," she said.

"I do not believe that he suffered a heart attack and fell. I believe he fell and if his heartbeat stopped it was because of the trauma to the head."

Caray and his wife have a home in neighboring Palm Springs during the offseason.

In a Valentine's Day matchup, K-State played its hearts out from the get-go. But in the end the Jayhawks showed the Cats

NO LOVE

SUN DEE MILLS
Kansas State Collegian

No. 5 Kansas showed up with no hearts for the Wildcats on Valentine's Day, downing the Cats 73-58 and ending the 11-game home-win streak before a sold-out crowd in Bramlage Coliseum.

"I'm disappointed and angry about how we played today," Cats coach Tom Asbury said. "We didn't rebound — we got our butts killed on the boards."

The Cats' 23 rebounds took a distant second to the Jayhawks' 37 boards. The Hawks also got twice as many second chances, notching 14 offensive rebounds in the game.

Sophomore Cat guard Duane Davis sprained his ankle on the tipoff. He reappeared once more before taking the bench for the game.

"It didn't hurt the team so much because we lost Duane, but because he's a starting player," Cat guard Chris Griffin said, who stepped in for Davis. "It shakes up the chemistry a little bit, but we're a team that plays a lot of players."

The player who made it to the basket for 26 points and 11 rebounds in Lawrence on Jan. 17 — Cat forward Manny Dies — was effectively kept to eight points and six boards.

"I came out and tried to play the same way I did there," Dies said. "They were a little more focused on me this time."

Three Cats — guard Aaron Swartzendruber and combination players Marcus McCollough and Ayome May — all scored in the double digits. But the Kansas player who was missing in the Jan. 17 matchup in Allen Fieldhouse made up for his absence in Bramlage.

Hawk all-America forward Raef LaFrentz scored 24 points and pulled down nine boards to narrowly miss his 51st career double-double.

"The addition of Raef was a big factor," Dies said. "I always tried to get up and get a hand in his face, but he's good. He's real good."

K-State kept the score close throughout the first half, narrowing KU's lead to three or four points seven times. But the Cats never put enough together offensively to take over the scoreboard. Still, Kansas coach Roy Williams said he worried.

"I never felt like they never made a big run on us," Williams said. "We maintained a seven-to-eight-point advantage the entire time, but we never pushed them away until the end."

In the second half, the Hawks' lead was never less than eight. Kansas forward Paul Pierce chalked up his fourth foul with 10 minutes left in the second half but managed to hold out, scoring 13 points and tying a team-high three assists.

"Paul just doesn't like purple," LaFrentz said.

The Cats' offensive struggle confused Asbury, he said.

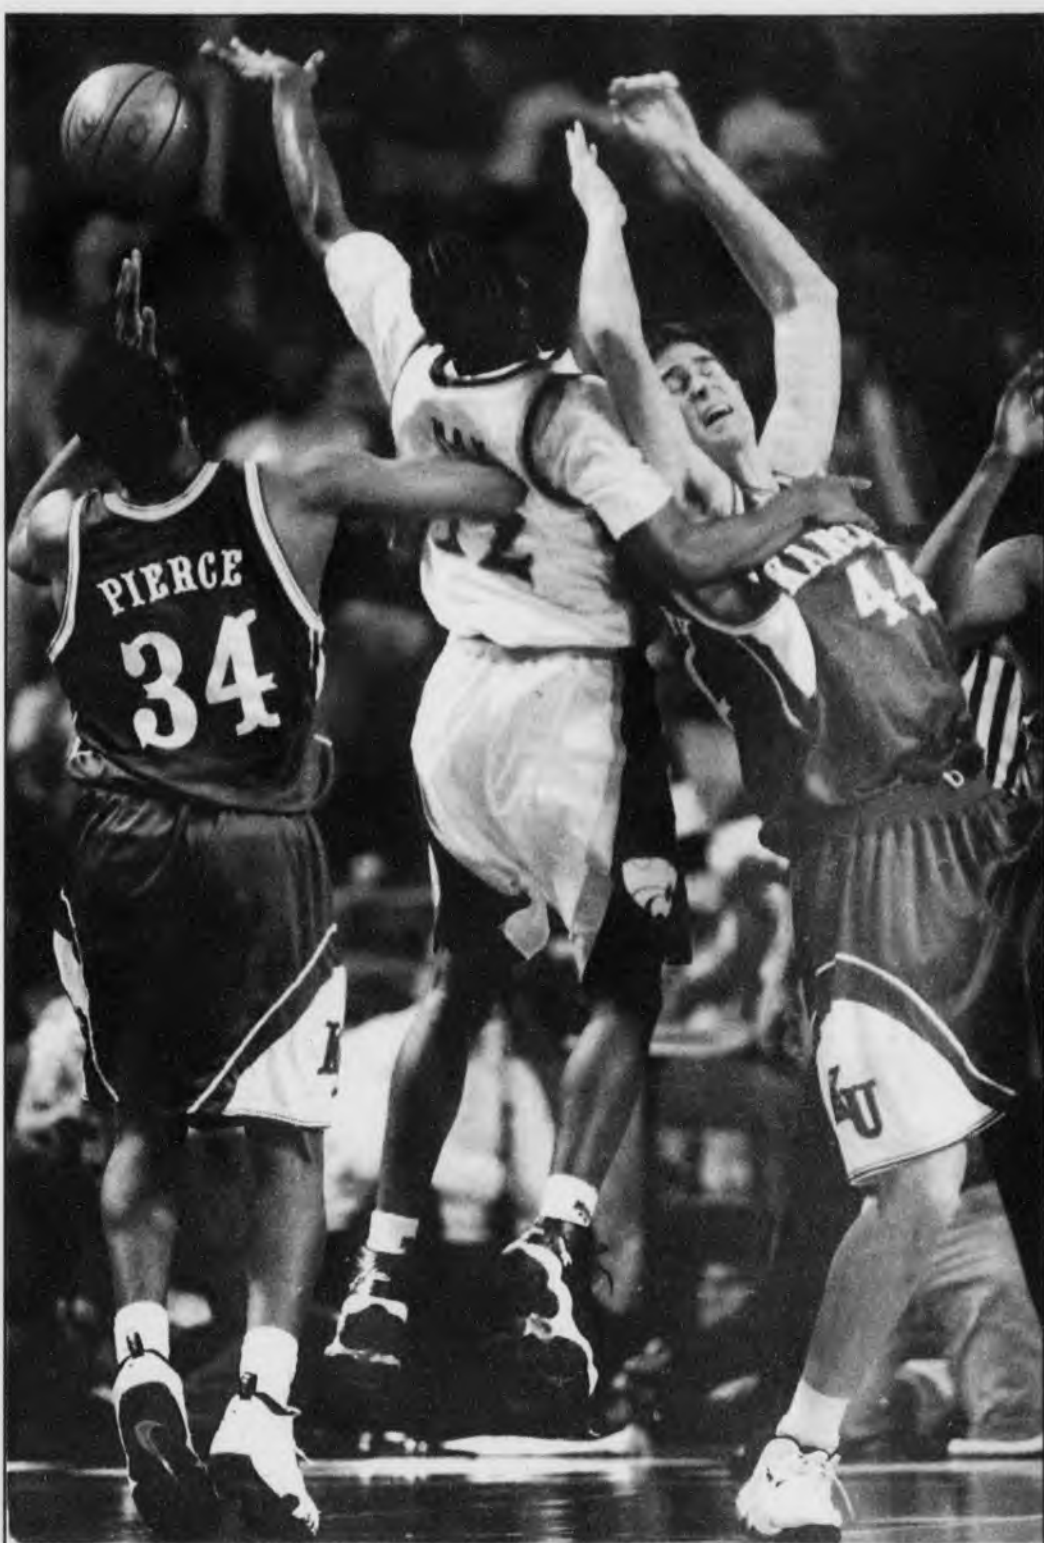

"We weren't very effective offensively, and I don't know why," he said. "The good news is that not many people will beat these people. There's not a soul alive that thought we'd beat these guys at the beginning of the season."

With the close 69-63 loss at Lawrence in their memory, the Cats' chance to beat the ranked Hawks at home was an attainable goal. Dies said the broken home win streak was hard to take, no matter who came in and broke it.

"I'd like to say I'm glad we lost to a good team," he said. "But a loss is still painful."

Cats stop Tigers in final minutes, end 5-game losing streak

DAN MERKER
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State women's basketball team exacted revenge Sunday over the Missouri Tigers, 66-57.

When the two teams met on Jan. 13 in Columbia, Mo., the Tigers, now 2-10 in the Big 12, beat the Wildcats for their first conference win of the season by a 72-56 score.

K-State avenged that loss and ended a five-game losing streak Sunday to improve its conference record to 4-8 and 10-12 overall.

The Cats started the game looking as though they would have no trouble cruising to a victory. K-State used an aggressive full-court defense to force Missouri into 11 turnovers in the game's first eight minutes, and the Cats kept an early 17-3 lead, spurred on by a 15-0 run.

The Tigers battled back, led by 55-percent shooting in the first half, to tie the game at 29 going into halftime. Missouri's defense kept K-State to 36-percent shooting in the first half, including three-of-14 by center

Angie Finkes, to stay in the game.

Many of K-State's players were missing inside shots. K-State head coach Deb Patterson said the game shouldn't have been as close as it was.

"If we make our layups, it ends up being almost a 15- or 20-point victory," Patterson said. "We missed at least 15 layups."

The Cats had 11 steals and forced 16 turnovers in the first half to combat Missouri's strong shooting percentage and head to the locker room even.

The teams played closely in the second half, with eight lead changes in the period, but K-State forced an additional 12 Tiger turnovers after halftime on its way to victory. The Cats had season highs with 21 steals and 28 forced turnovers. Forward Jenny Coalson, in addition to scoring 11 points, tallied 10 steals.

K-State was out-rebounded in the first half, but grabbed more in the second half as a key in the game. Led by forward Brandy Harris, the Cats ended up with 13 offensive rebounds, getting many second-chance points after short misses.

"I was not happy with our rebounding numbers in the first half," Patterson said. "When Brandy stepped up and got us a couple of second-shot opportunities in the second half, it really helped keep some wind in our sails."

The Cats continued their practice of answering the Missouri tactic of fronting K-State's post players by lobbing the ball to Finkes. As a result, she had 22 field-goal attempts and recovered from the first half by adding four second-half field goals to finish with 18 points.

The teams were tied at 55 late, but K-State kept the Tigers to two points in the last four minutes to take control of the game. In the last minute, guard Brit Jacobson had two of her six steals to ice the game. She also had 18 points to tie Finkes for the team lead.

"Down the stretch, I thought we stepped up and made huge defensive plays," Patterson said. "That got us a victory."

Jayhawks, LaFrentz break hearts of Cats, fans on a day where love was to prevail

On Valentine's Day, hearts were breaking all over Bramlage Coliseum.

When sophomore Wildcat point guard and "offensive coordinator" Duane Davis sprained his ankle almost immediately and went to the bench, his heart broke. The hearts of his teammates — who rely on his ball-handling on the court — broke, too.

When junior Cat forward Manny Dies lost the tipoff to the future top-10 NBA pick and Kansas all-America Raef LaFrentz, who took the ball to the basket with definition, Cat fans' hearts cracked.

When Dies then proceeded to miss his next two opportunities due to the Jayhawks' stepped-up defensive efforts on the inside guy, his heart was probably breaking.

When Dies sat down with more than 12 minutes to go in the first half because his coach, Tom Asbury, thought he wasn't getting it done, no doubt Dies' heart was breaking.

When the Cats would close the lead to four points, as they did several times in the first half, only to have LaFrentz nail a layup or Hawk guard Billy Thomas sink a three-pointer, more hearts broke.

But like any unrequited love story, the underdog wasn't ready to give up.

When the Cats came out of the locker room down 38-30, they knew what they were up against. A team Asbury has said consists of "83 all-Americans."

"They don't have a guy on their team that we could recruit and we don't have a guy on our team that would've recruited," Asbury said after the game. "Logic tells you they should beat us by 200."

The gambling line, if you do that sort of thing, made the Hawks eight-point favorites. Broken hearts aside, no one was ready to concede this fact. Not the players, not the almost 8,000 Cat fans in attendance, not even the K-State beat writers who wanted to be the first ones in 15 years to write about how K-State beat Kansas in Manhattan.

Down by eight, the Cats set out to mend some hearts.

Sophomore Cat guard Josh Reid fired up a three-pointer, and the Hawks' Paul Pierce promptly fouled him. But Reid only converted on one of those three freebies, breaking Reid's heart.

Senior Cat guard Aaron Swartzendruber, playing the intrastate rival for the last time, then let two threes loose within three minutes. But when the Hawks' scoring efforts put the Cats down by 11 only seconds later, his heart began to break.

Of any team Swartzendruber has played on in his college career, this team was the one that had a legitimate chance to beat the Hawks. He said as much after the game.

"We thought we had a chance," he said. "It didn't work out. Now we have to concentrate on Iowa State."

He'll go to his home state, Iowa, on Wednesday to play with a broken heart, never having beaten the hated Hawks.

Soon after, the Cats hit a seven-minute streak without a field goal. The Hawks' defense rose a notch, and the Cats hit every free throw they had during this time. Not enough.

During this period, Cat center Shawn Rhodes notched his fifth foul. As a junior, Rhodes has two more chances next season to break the Hawks' hearts. But he didn't care about that as he joined Davis and the rest of the team on the bench.

At the 3:09 mark, junior guard Ayome May broke the streak with a jumper to narrow the widening lead to nine. But the 6,000-odd Hawk fans contaminating the Purple Palace with their red and blue set out to break a few hearts themselves.

Their cries of excitement as the lead widened began a crescendo that ended with the "Rock Chalk" chant at the 45-second mark. That was the exclamation point.

The faithful referees who sit in the K-State student section had written on their dry erase board earlier, "Why are the KU fans louder than the K-State fans?"

Because the KU fans traveled an hour and a half to lead that cheer and delight in the Cats' pain.

At the last time out, Bramlage echoed with the fight song from fans who felt they could do nothing but be supportive at this time of loss. But the song was drowned out by Kansas cheers as time dwindled away.

In the end, anyone with a purple heart left the arena with it in two pieces. The Hawks, ever the Casanova of the state of Kansas in basketball, tore out Cat hearts and stomped them to pieces.

Valentine's Day is highly overrated.

K-STATE JAZZ FESTIVAL

Count Basie Orchestra delivers memorable show at McCain

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

There are three things you can depend on in Manhattan: the Anderson bell tower, irrational weather and the Count Basie Orchestra.

For the third year in a row, the Basie band has swung through Manhattan as part of the K-State Jazz Festival. Saturday night the Basie band, along with special guest Jon Faddis, blew the pants off a couple thousand people in McCain Auditorium.

The 19 members of the Basie band comfortably filled the first half with Basie standards ("Skylark," "Corner Pocket") and some pieces off the group's Grammy-winning 1996 album with the New York Voices ("Basie Power," "In a Mellow Tone"). Seeing musical director Grover Mitchell and the group back on McCain's stage is always welcome.

"The Drum Thing," a piece by Basie trumpeter Bob Ojeda, nearly stopped the show cold with the incomparable Butch Miles' frenzied drum solo — jazz artistry in its most celebrated form. Chris Morrell's vocals on "Skylark" were as rich as Kenny Hing's tenor saxophone solos, which were highlighted throughout the evening.

For many of the repeat visitors from last year's concert, the second-half feature of Faddis was the main draw.

Faddis arrived in Manhattan on Friday in time for the reception honoring Matt Betton at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art. Betton was again honored at the beginning of the second half with applause. A plaque of Gov. Bill Graves' proclamation of Feb. 14, 1998, as Dizzy Gillespie Day in Kansas was given to Faddis, who said he would give it to Gillespie's widow, Lorraine.

Faddis mugged repeatedly for the audience, drawing laughs at his reply to Graves' press secretary Mike Matson, who presented the plaque.

"If you would pass this on to the governor, heretofore if he would supply me with a custom-made, up-end trumpet — if he does that, I'll even be his Valentine," Faddis said.

There are few trumpeters alive who can trace their development directly to masters like Lionel Hampton and Gillespie. It was appropriate for this year's festival to honor Gillespie, since he mentored Faddis and the two were lifelong friends until Gillespie's death in 1993.

Faddis took control of the Basie band and began with a few Gillespie tunes, the Latin-tinged "Algo Bueno" and the landmark Chano Pozo-Gillespie piece "Manteca."

Dennis Wilson, director of jazz studies at K-State, likes a finale and the one he wrote for this year's festival managed to upstage his last two years' efforts. Written while touring with the Carnegie Hall Jazz Band, which Faddis directs, "Let Your Voice Sing Out" was so big it had everything going against it. Wilson brought his Concert Jazz Ensemble onstage with the Basie band, percussion director Anthony DiSanza and to cap it off, the United Black Voices.

The number began humbly with Freeman Davis reading biographical statements of Gillespie's life, accompanied by DiSanza's bongo tapping and Faddis' short riffs on Gillespie's signature music.

Slowly, the piece materialized with the Concert Jazz Ensemble fanning in with the Basie band with a somewhat conventional Big Band sound. It then broke into a kind of funky, street-lovin' beat, a Wilson specialty, that eventually brought out the Voices for an emotional culmination.

The finale was one of those rare stage moments when nothing should work, yet everything does — a synthesis of styles, sounds and generations. Which is what the K-State Jazz Festival itself has become: A celebration of an accessible art form that has found a permanent home in Manhattan.

Committee makes faculty wages top priority in restructuring plan

several years down the road.

Wefald had complimented the committee earlier on making faculty salaries one of its top priorities in the restructuring and said it was finding ways to get salaries up to peer level.

"I appreciate that they are willing to look at some of our considerations," he said.

Students at the meeting were skeptical if the new plan addressed the credit-transfer issue from community colleges to four-year institutions.

However, the committee said one of the plan's targets was cooperation among postsecondary programs for the transferability of courses.

Adkins said the report would also provide incentives for consolidations and merging among the institutes.

"We want to try to integrate the structures between the regents facilities and community colleges," he said.

The plan is up for approval during this legislative session. If the plan is approved, the committee would make the first appointments to the postsecondary council on Nov. 1, and the 17-month transition to a single governing board would begin Feb. 1, 1999.

The council would consist of 11 members appointed by the Governor and approved by the Senate.

They would serve six-year terms, compared with the two-year rotation of the regents board.

FIRE IN THE 'VILLE

A Saturday morning fire engulfs the northeast corner of Aggieville, destroying businesses, buildings and traditions

Fire forces business owners to consider options for future

JAKE PALENSKE
Kansas State Collegian

A fire in Manhattan's Aggieville district early Saturday morning damaged buildings and businesses.

It also damaged lives.

The Manhattan Fire Department responded to a call at 3:42 a.m. from the 1100 block of Moro Street. More than three hours later, the fire was under control, and business owners arrived to examine their losses.

Adam Gaines, owner of Greek's Pizzeria, said the worst part of the fire is the lost time and work he put into opening the restaurant.

"We have only been open for a little over a year, and it took me a year to line up a place to put the business and to get all the equipment we needed," Gaines said. "It is really tough to deal with seeing all the work and time I put into opening the business destroyed."

Gaines said he would consider rebuilding after he had consulted with his insurance company.

"I really liked having the business in Aggieville, and we would like to stay here if possible," Gaines said. "We will look at rebuilding in this spot, and also see if any other buildings open up where we could put the business."

Walter Glover, owner of Club Karrington, said he was very discouraged by the loss of his new business. Glover recently purchased the club, formerly known as Bombers.

"The only thing I wanted to do was provide a good, clean place for students to have fun," Glover said. "Now it seems like all hopes I had of making something work are gone."

Glover said that not all of the equipment and materials inside the club were insured. He also said his worst loss was emotional.

Fire destroys 2 buildings; cause remains unknown

MATT KREPS
Kansas State Collegian

The Saturday morning fire that enveloped the 1100 block of Moro Street was contained to two buildings. Both were destroyed.

The fire was reported to the Manhattan Fire Department at 3:42 a.m. Crews arrived on the scene four minutes later, but the buildings that housed Greek's Pizzeria, Club Karrington and Adventure Travel were destroyed by the fire.

The cause of the fire is still unknown. Fire Department Battalion Chief Mike Heptig said the state fire marshal will begin an investigation today, but there is no indication as to how long it will take.

Forty-eight firefighters and three trucks were needed to bring the blaze under control, Fire Chief Larry Reese said. Off-duty firefighters were also called to the scene to relieve those on duty.

"We had to just to keep rotating because people were getting tired," Reese said.

Heptig said the fire was under control by 7 a.m. Saturday, but firefighters were spraying the rubble throughout the day to cool the ashes.

Staff members at Scoreboard, located across the street from the fire, were working late when Loren Minnich, a bartender, saw the flames from Adventure Travel and reported the blaze early Saturday morning.

"We just happened to have a problem with our sump pump, or else we would have been long gone," he said.

Minnich said the heat from the fire could be felt inside the bar where he watched the blaze until about 4:30 a.m.

Rubble fell into the middle of Moro, and witnesses reported bursts of flames shooting into the street from the collapsing buildings.

"We thought they had it under control, and all of the sudden it just surged," Minnich said.

Buildings located to the east and west of the destroyed buildings also sustained heavy damage.

Speed Wash Laundry's walls and roof collapsed due to the weight of water and rubble from the Adventure Travel building. The Futon Store and On the Wild Side, located west of the fire, sustained smoke and water damage.

Damage was not restricted to the north side of Moro Street.

"We also have damage along the south side of the street at Pizza Hut and the Varsity Theatre from broken glass from the heat," Reese said. The Varsity Theatre sign melted due to the intense heat.

Onlookers gathered along 11th and 12th streets to see the fire.

"Last time I saw a glow in the sky like this was when Nichols Gymnasium burned," said Warren Spurlock, a Red

"Not everything was insured, and my losses run much deeper than material things," Glover said. "I am really shocked and upset by the whole thing."

Charlie Busch owned the building that housed Club Karrington and Adventure Travel. It was a total loss.

Busch's building, built in 1915, was one of Aggieville's oldest. During the Depression, the second floor of the building was made into a dance hall and was equipped with a spring-mounted dance floor, which still existed before the fire.

"I am basically waiting to find out what the insurance company is going to do at this point," Busch said. "After I find out how much I am insured for and what my loan balance is, then I will decide whether or not to rebuild."

Busch said his wife, Connie, owner of Adventure Travel, has been working to recover records of the airline reservations she has made.

"She has basically been trying to get ahold of the major airlines to see if they can help her with recovering the records of her reservations," he said. "After that, she will begin contacting her customers and trying to rebuild the business."

Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association, said other store owners in Aggieville are prepared to assist their fellow merchants in any way they can.

"Whenever you have a catastrophe like this, it tends to make people pull together," Sieben said. "Basically, the ABA told the merchants who suffered losses from the fire that we would do whatever we could to help them. Right now we are basically in a supporting role to the business owners."

"The merchants of Aggieville will pull together and make things better, if at all possible," she said.

Cross volunteer on the scene to provide relief to the firefighters.

Others who witnessed the blaze said the loss of the Club Karrington building, a historic nightclub under many previous owners, would hurt the Aggieville district.

"It's just a part of history, and it's gone now," said Deb Taylor, a former K-State student and Manhattan resident who came down to see the fire. "We'd go over from Last Chance to the Avalon (a previous club in the building) and dance the night away."

Club Karrington employees said the fire came at a bad time. Owner Walter Glover had recently taken over the club, formerly known as Bombers, and was making improvements, they said.

Club Karrington employee Gary Bennett said things looked fine when the club closed about an hour before the fire.

"When we all left the bar last night at about a quarter till 3, everything was fine," he said Saturday.

Bennett also said the club's business was taking off. He said he had spoken with Frankie Rivera, the club's manager, just hours before the fire.

"I talked to Frankie last night and they had big plans for the place," Bennett said.

Michelle Snyder, another employee, said the owners had invested a lot of money into improving the club's facilities. She said the club had invested $2,500 in plumbing upgrades, installed a new dance floor and remodeled the upstairs portion for parties and special events.

"They're going to be really upset about this," she said.

As cleanup began Saturday morning, officials closed the 1100 block of Moro, but patrons used back entrances to conduct business as usual throughout the day.

By noon, most businesses had crowds of people wanting lunch and a view of the activity.

Moro remained closed throughout the day, as crews used heavy equipment to demolish the remaining structure and remove debris from the street.

Heptig said some of the block would remain closed to traffic for part of this week to allow investigators to examine the scene. Safety concerns will also keep the street closed, he said.

Riley County Police Department officers were on site through the weekend to guard against trespassers, especially after Saturday afternoon's K-State men's basketball game against the University of Kansas.

As of Sunday night, extra patrols were ordered for the area, but officers were not actively guarding the fire site. An RCPD spokesperson said anyone crossing the tape would be issued a notice to appear for criminal trespass.

CRAIG WALDSCHMIDT, SENIOR IN MASS COMMUNICATIONS, AND MICHELLE MYERS, JUNIOR IN PSYCHOLOGY, WATCHED THE SATURDAY MORNING FIRE. WALDSCHMIDT AND MYERS WATCHED FROM AN APARTMENT ABOVE 12TH AND MORO STREETS. A BUT WAS MOVED BACK BY POLICE.

"WE ARE SO LUCKY, NOT THAT OUR RESTAURANT WAS NOT DAMAGED, BUT THAT NO ONE WAS HURT. WE HAVE SEEN SOME PRETTY WILD NIGHTS, BUT THIS ONE WAS PARTICULARLY SCARY FOR ME. MY BUSINESS WAS IN DANGER."

IT TOOK THREE TRUCKS FOUR HOURS TO STOP THE BLAZE THAT SWEEPED THROUGH CLUB KARRINGTON, GREEK'S PIZZERIA AND ADVENTURE TRAVEL EARLY SATURDAY MORNING.

Fire in Aggieville

The fire was reported to the Manhattan Fire Department at 3:42 a.m. Saturday. Crews arrived on the scene four minutes later. Early reports indicated the fire might have started in the Adventure Travel building. Fire Department Battalion Chief Mike Heptig said the state fire marshal will begin an investigation today, but there is not an indication yet as to how long it will take.

Speed Wash Laundry's walls and roof collapsed due to the weight of water and rubble from the Adventure Travel building. The Futon Store and On the Wild Side sustained smoke and water damage. Forty-eight firefighters and three trucks were needed to bring the blaze under control. Heptig said the fire was under control by 7 a.m.

The state-appraised value of the destroyed buildings is more than $300,000. The damaged buildings are valued at more than $100,000. Building owners said insurance estimates would arrive early this week.

The 1100 block of Moro Street will remain closed to traffic until the fire marshal deems it safe. Anyone crossing the Riley County Police Department tape line will be issued a notice to appear for criminal trespass.

Music scene may feel effects of weekend fire

PHIL KELLUM
Kansas State Collegian

With the loss of Club Karrington on Saturday morning to fire, the Manhattan music scene was dealt a blow.

Club Karrington was the only medium-sized venue in town for live music. It also leaves one less place for bands to play.

Eric Melin, drummer for Ultimate Fakebook, said, "Now we have no mid-line, kind of big place to go see shows at. Chance is awesome, but it's small," he said. "There's nothing in between the Warehouse and Chance now, and the Warehouse costs a lot of money to rent out."

Melin also said the music scene will hurt because there is only one place left to play in Aggieville on a regular basis.

"It limits the possibilities of places to play by one down to about one. At the same time, the current management wasn't particularly receptive to live music, and they were only doing it on Wednesday nights," he said.

Marc Johnson, guitarist for Jiffy Boy, said the fire will affect the local music scene greatly, but the bands will move on.

"It will affect it a lot, but if bands want to find another place to play, they could. We'll all move on and hopefully someone will open a new club," he said.

Several local bands had shows lined up at Club Karrington in the upcoming weeks.

Jiffy Boy was to play there on Feb. 25 with O'Phil.

"I was just talking about setting up an Arthur Dodge show there the other day. I guess I don't have to worry about that now," Melin said.

The building that housed Club Karrington was the site of several bars in the past, including Bombers, Snookie's, Cavalier Club and Charlie's.

It was also the site of several concerts from bands that played there before they went on to achieve national success.

In 1989, ska-punk pioneers Operation Ivy passed up playing in Lawrence or Kansas City and instead played there on their only national tour. Members of Operation Ivy went on to form platinum-selling punk band Rancid.

The band 311 played there in 1994 several months before they found national success, and Hum also played there more than once.

Aggieville merchants offer support to fire victims

► REBUILDING FROM FIRE TO BE BIGGEST CHANGE THE AREA HAS SEEN IN YEARS.

ANDREW WIMMER

Once the debris has been cleared from the 1100 block of Moro Street, Aggieville merchants said they will continue about their business and begin the task of restoring the eastern edge of the historical district.

Kim Willingham, owner of Hunan Express, said he was relieved the flames that claimed the adjacent buildings early Saturday morning did no structural damage to his restaurant. The street was barricaded over the weekend, forcing Willingham to close his business. He planned to reopen sometime Sunday.

"We are so lucky, not that our restaurant was not damaged, but that no one was hurt," Willingham said.

"We have seen some pretty wild nights, but this one was particularly scary for me. My business was in danger."

Firefighters worked from just before 4 a.m. Saturday well into the evening, and several Aggieville merchants provided food for the firefighters.

"Considering that the building was a total loss, we can all count our blessings," said Mike Heptig, Manhattan Fire Department Battalion Chief. "Everyone down here pitched in. It is really a remarkable community."

After the buildings' remaining walls were destroyed Saturday afternoon, only rubble remained.

Heptig said the state fire marshal will begin his investigation today. Once the cause of the fire has been determined, he said the rest of the cleanup can proceed.

Heptig said traffic on Moro Street will be closed until the fire marshal deems the area safe.

Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association, said Saturday's events were difficult for all area merchants.

"There was really nothing for us to do," she said. "We offered to help in any way we could, but since the buildings were a total loss, we were really helpless."

"It's an opportunity for the Aggieville community to show its strength and commitment to the community."

Sieben said she hopes the buildings' owners will construct new buildings that match other Aggieville buildings and the historic style.

City Manager Gary Greer said there are no restrictions on building styles in Aggieville, as long as the structures meet building codes and zoning restrictions.

"The building codes do not deal with the style of the building," Greer said.

"Unless the building is a registered historical site, which I don't think it is in this case, then we have no jurisdiction on the style the owner chooses."

Sieben encouraged the owners to rebuild their business using the same architectural style as before.

"It would be nice if they kept with the traditional style that is distinctive of Aggieville shops," Sieben said.

"But in the end, it's up to the individual owners."

Library fee proposal dies in Privilege Fee Committee

JESSI BRUNSON
Kansas State Collegian

Privilege Fee Committee members failed to write a bill supporting a student fee to fund library periodical subscriptions at their meeting Monday.

After nearly two hours of discussion about funding for Hale Library, committee secretary Kimberly Peschka moved to write legislation for a $328,000 fee — about 85 cents per credit hour — to go toward periodical funding.

The motion died for lack of a second. The committee heard the final report from the Student Senate Ad Hoc Committee on Library Subscriptions formed during the fall semester to investigate funding options. As a member of both committees, Privilege Fee Vice Chair Aaron Truax outlined the main points of the final report.

The ad hoc committee was not in favor of establishing a privilege fee to fund journal subscriptions. Their report mentioned several other options, including many that were first outlined in the final report of the university's library task force published last October.

Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock said each of the ad hoc committee's suggestions had already been looked into and rejected. He also said he was disappointed that no one from the ad hoc committee had contacted him before making the recommendations.

Peschka said the ad hoc committee should have contacted Hobrock before issuing its report.

"I have a real problem that we didn't contact Hobrock on this," she said. "What's the difference between this and the plan the task force came up with?"

Hobrock said library task force members, who worked for six months to develop funding alternatives for the library, felt their final and best option was a privilege fee paid by K-State students. The library lowered its initial request of $1 per credit hour to 85 cents per credit hour to match funding that will come from the KSU Foundation and state allocations.

Hobrock said the request for a student fee was a modest one.

"I believe this is one of the very tough decisions that we make here at K-State that will benefit K-State. This is a modest request, but it is what it is going to take to solve the problem," he said.

Arts and Sciences Council member

Dan Cataldi spoke in defense of the proposed privilege fee. The council wrote a resolution supporting the fee at its last meeting.

"The more journals we cut, the fewer good faculty we'll bring in. If we lose a lot of faculty, we lose a lot of grant money and research that would come from that. In addition, we lose a lot of quality students," he said. "This reflects on our university nationally and internationally."

Committee members said they were concerned that the Kansas Legislature wasn't doing more to remedy the library funding problem.

Hobrock said K-State receives less legislative support than its peer institutions.

"The Legislature just chooses not to fund us ... the facts show that K-State has 55 percent of the average operating funds of its peers," Hobrock said.

Privilege Fee Committee member Jeff Meder said if the fee passed, the wrong people would be funding the library.

"The responsibility has been shifted from those who it should be put upon onto the students," Meder said.

► ROBERTS EXPLAINS STANCE ON U.S.-IRAQI STANDOFF

U.S.

Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., said Monday he favors military action against Iraq, but only if the Iraqi government is completely restructured as part of U.S. involvement.

Roberts spoke about U.S. foreign policy with regard to Iraq at the 79th annual Chamber of Commerce meeting Monday night.

A K-State alumnus who was known in the House of Representatives for his farm legislation, Roberts used his time at the podium to illustrate the need for sound reasoning in the approach to the Iraqi showdown with U.N. weapons inspectors.

He said the United States needs to be prepared to offer its full support both to troops overseas and to families at home before deciding to endorse any military strike against Iraq. The senator said a clear goal needs to be defined for any action regarding Iraq. Now, the goal is to open closed doors to U.N. weapons inspectors.

Moreover, Roberts said President Clinton has only asked for "limited strikes," which he does not think will answer the problem.

"If we bomb for four or five days and kill innocent civilians in the process, do you think Saddam Hussein will hold out the welcome mat for weapons inspectors?" Roberts asked.

Roberts said a military operation needs to include a complete restructuring of Iraq's government to remove the Middle Eastern threat. Without that type of change, the problem will persist, he said.

"At best, after all is said and done, Saddam Hussein will still be there, the Republican Guard will still be there, the scientists will still be there and the weapons will still be there," Roberts said.

Roberts said a good test of the need for an overseas military operation is to ask how a political leader would answer the loved one of a dead soldier who asked "For what did they die?"

Another problem with military action in the Middle East is a lack of support from the United States' previous allies in the Persian Gulf War, he said.

Roberts said France wants to sell Iraqi oil to China, which needs the oil to support its economy.

Russia wants oil sales to continue so other nations that owe it money can repay the debt and bolster its troubled economy.

Also, Saudi Arabia has denied the United States the use of its military bases to launch offensives. The entire strike would have to come from the sea.

"If we don't come out and say we are in support of a new regime in Iraq, we will never get the support of our allies," Roberts said.

Roberts said the United States has three aircraft carriers in the Persian Gulf, leaving none in other areas and costing taxpayers millions of dollars that could be spent elsewhere.

Roberts also touched close to home with comments about Fort Riley.

The military base's closing was postponed until the Department of Defense can plan for what the United States will need for the coming years without political influences in election years, he said.

Finally, Roberts said he wanted to get troops home from Bosnia.

"We wanted to get the flag back from Bosnia, but that hasn't happened yet," he said.

Krause honored as citizen of year

Bob Krause, K-State's vice president of institutional advancement, received the Lud Fisar Citizen of the Year award at Monday's Manhattan Chamber of Commerce banquet.

The award, named after a Manhattan school teacher and community leader who was citizen of the year in 1973, recognizes individuals who make outstanding and repeated contributions to the Manhattan community.

Dennis Mullin, the 1997 chairman of the Chamber board, presented the award.

Mullin said Krause is committed to making the university and community successful through a partnership.

Krause has served on various Chamber of Commerce boards and volunteered with community improvement projects since arriving in Manhattan. He is a central figure in relations between the city and the university, and a key figure in the Colbert Hills Golf Course project.

"He serves with endless energy, clear vision and a heart for this community," Mullin said.

In accepting the award, Krause pointed to the tie between the community and the university. He said the two are tied together and depend on each other for success.

"The future of our great university is tied up with the future of our community," Krause said.

Past recipients of the award include President Jon Wefald, Ruth Ann Wefald, K-State football coach Bill Snyder and past President James McCain.

SGA stresses importance of students in governing

ANGELA KISTNER
Kansas State Collegian

EDITOR'S NOTE: Today marks the beginning of "Where Is the Power," a three-part series featuring various viewpoints on the power structure at K-State. While today's story focuses on student government leaders' opinions, administrators' and other students' perspectives will be highlighted on Wednesday and Thursday.

This year's Student Governing Association elections are almost here. Soon, students will have to decide who they want controlling their student fee money and making decisions.

Students will be deciding who they want in power. But is the power truly with SGA? Where is the power at K-State?

K-State's SGA has more powers than most other universities. Student Body President Tim Riemann said.

"The reason why the SGA at K-State has so much responsibility is because we've earned it," Riemann said. "The senators take SGA seriously."

"It (SGA) is not a joke," Jennafer Neufeld, student body vice president, said.

Riemann said some student governments are in shambles because no one wants to put time into them.

"The student senators that work around here put in hours upon hours of time into it. That's why we continue to get the power," he said.

Student Senate Chair Jeff Dougan also said SGA has been given more power than most other student governments in the United States.

Dougan said President Jon Wefald gives SGA autonomy.

"We've never been overruled by the administration. At a lot of other different universities, the student government will just be there as almost purely as an advisory capacity," Dougan said. "They're not really taken seriously. Here at K-State we're taken very seriously."

Jayhawk-colored chicken released near Union Friday; adopted by Vet-Med worker

JOHN HENDERSON
Kansas State Collegian

Some overzealous fans apparently found a new mascot for the University of Kansas men's basketball team before Saturday's game against K-State in Bramlage Coliseum.

K-State Police reported a female chicken, painted red and blue, running loose near the K-State Student Union at 9:40 a.m. Friday.

Lt. Richard Herrman said the hen was taken by police to the Veterinary Medicine Complex.

Jim Carpenter, head of Veterinary Medicine's Exotic Animal, Wildlife and Zoo Animal Medical Service, said the hen was in good health. Whoever painted it used a non-toxic food dye instead of a lead-based paint that might poison the animal, he said.

Herrman said this is not the first time a red and blue chicken has been found on the day of a KU-K-State matchup. In the past, such chickens have been found on the floor of Bramlage before a basketball game or in the stadium before football.

"It's not an uncommon event on K-State," he said.

"It's not as bad as it's been. It used to be a lot worse."

This year's hen was lucky, he said. Hens have sustained injury from being thrown out of cars in the past. Carpenter said it could have been attacked by cats or succumbed to stress.

"Obviously, we encourage people not to do this," Carpenter said.

The hen was adopted by Joanna Berg, health care technician at the Veterinary Medicine Complex, who is part owner of a farm north of Blaine, about 30 miles northeast of Manhattan. She said her new hen should regain its normal color after a few days in the rain.

K-State lost to KU 73-58 on Saturday.

Marshals search for clues, cause of Aggieville blaze

TRAVIS D. LENKNER
Kansas State Collegian

State fire marshals sifted through the remains of two Aggieville buildings Monday searching for the cause of a Saturday morning fire in the 1100 block of Moro Street.

By the time it was extinguished Saturday, the fire had gutted Club Karrington, Adventure Travel International and Greek's Pizzeria, and Speed Wash Laundry was destroyed by the weight of debris from the neighboring buildings. Adjacent buildings on the north side of the block were also damaged.

Manhattan Fire Department Battalion Chief Jerry Snyder said fire marshals weren't able to finish their investigation Monday, though they worked throughout the day.

"They should hopefully be able to finish things up tomorrow," he said late Monday afternoon.

Damage estimates weren't available Monday, but should be released sometime today, Snyder said.

Investigators closed part of Moro Street to vehicle traffic Monday, allowing heavy machinery to move debris at the scene. Pedestrians were still allowed, and many walked down Moro Street to look at the scene of the blaze that Fire Chief Larry Reese has called one of the worst in Manhattan's history.

It took 48 firefighters more than three hours to put out the fire, which was reported at 3:42 a.m. Saturday. The remains were still smoldering Monday afternoon.

Fire marshals, insurance inspectors and other emergency personnel stepped over bricks, ash and twisted metal to search for clues in the investigation. Reese said crews started their search near Adventure Travel International, which is where employees of Aggieville Pizza and Scoreboard, both across the street, said they saw flames when they reported the fire.

NATIONAL NEWS

School officials concerned by test scores of teachers on reading, writing, math

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Virginia's governor, James S. Gilmore, meant to shock his audience this month when he reported that as many as one-third of would-be teachers in the state flunked a national test of basic reading, writing and mathematics.

If it was bad news for Virginia, it was worse for the nation. Virginia has the country's highest cutoff score for the Praxis I, used in 20 states to screen teacher college candidates and beginning teachers. Scarcely more than half the students who took the test nationwide would have made the Virginia cut.

"Virginia students would be doing much better than the national average," said Charlotte Solomon, in charge of the Praxis examinations for the Educational Testing Service, a private company that supplies the tests to states. "It begs the question of whether it's good enough."

Around the country, state education officials are asking whether tests of general knowledge and of specific subjects are rigorous enough to ensure that able people become teachers. The issue has risen in importance because of widespread efforts to raise standards for what children should know and be able to do.

For some states, it means setting standards for the first time.

Last October in New Hampshire, the board of education voted to adopt Praxis I starting this fall after years of opening the profession to anyone with a college teaching degree who could find work. Democratic Gov. Jeanne Shaheen vetoed legislation that would have required the tests for teachers who already have jobs.

Some 35 states use Praxis I or more advanced tests in the Praxis series used to certify graduates for general knowledge, professional skills and subject knowledge. Some states have their own tests.

Explanations vary on why scores are low, but poor pay tops the list.

"It clearly holds back who it is that's entering," said Gordon M. Ambach, executive director of the Council of Chief State School Officers.

Teaching has become less attractive for women and minorities since barriers to other, more lucrative and prestigious jobs have been lowered.

Education officials also point out that not everyone with low test scores goes on to teach or even get an education degree.

In Pennsylvania, education officials are beginning to raise the bar for a number of tests. Among those being examined is a 120-question, general knowledge test for beginning teachers that covers social studies, math, literature, the arts and science.

"We have a relatively high pass rate, but as we look at the exams and we look at the cut scores, we're not convinced that it is a meaningful exercise," said Michael Poliakoff, a deputy secretary of education. Nearly 91 percent of would-be teachers who took the general knowledge test last fall passed it.

But most of the test-takers scored just about at the national average of 657 on a scale of 600-695. The state passing score is 644, close to that of several other states. The highest cut score of any state is 649 in Maine, New Jersey, New York and Rhode Island.

WORLDREPORT

205 people killed in Taiwan plane crash; key financial officials among fatalities

TAIPEI, Taiwan — A China Airlines jet trying to land in fog crashed into a country neighborhood Monday, ripping the roofs off houses before skidding into a rice paddy and erupting in flames.

Authorities said all 196 aboard and nine people on the ground were killed.

Firefighters went house to house in the blackened neighborhood, putting out the flames licking at doors and windows, and searching for survivors. Searchlights illuminated a life raft from the Airbus A-300, wrapped around a broken tree stump.

Seats from the plane were scattered in the dirt, one with a body trapped beneath it.

China Airlines said the dead included the governor of Taiwan's Central Bank and other key financial officials, Taiwanese families returning from vacations in Bali, and four Americans. Victims on the ground included a 2-month-old baby.

Witnesses said the airliner hit hundreds of yards short of the runway at Chiang Kai-shek Airport, 25 miles west of Taipei.

It tore through the second floors of homes strung along a highway before sliding to a stop in flames.

"I heard a blast and was scared to death. Parts of the house started to fall down," said Chen Ah-mei, who had to crawl out of the ruins of her home on her hands and knees. She and her husband were being treated at a hospital.

Authorities sealed off the neighborhood, leaving families of passengers to congregate at hospitals and the airport.

Relatives broke into tears and fell into one another's arms as the extent of the disaster hit them. One woman collapsed to the floor.

Rescue workers on the scene said they had given up looking for survivors, but the deputy director-general of Taiwan's Civil Aeronautics Administration, Chang Kuocheng, said he still hoped to find survivors among the 182 passengers and 14 crew members.

Airport officials said two flight data recorders were recovered and were being analyzed to help determine the cause of the crash.

The twin-engine Airbus went down while attempting to land on a second approach at 8:09 p.m. local time at the airport's northern runway, the Taipei-based China Airlines reported.

Heavy fog was reported around the airport throughout the afternoon and evening, and a light rain was falling at the time of the crash.

Hock, Kraai announce presidential bid

JOSHUA STURGILL
Kansas State Collegian

Longtime K-Staters Trey Hock and Bill Kraai announced their candidacy for student body president and vice president Monday afternoon in the free-speech zone.

"Bill and I have 11 years collective experience at K-State. We just know a lot about the interworkings of the university," Hock said. "Not to mention we have a really cool platform."

Hock, graduate student in English, and Kraai, senior in art, said they want to put the power of Student Governing Association back into student hands and increase student interest in SGA.

"We want SGA to have more than just an 'opendoor' policy, and that means an active approach to student government," Hock said.

The pair said they want students to be informed about campus issues and to get excited about voting.

"Voting is your voice," Kraai said, "and we are dedicated to listen to that voice."

The candidates said their platform includes working to build a K-State that students can be proud of.

This includes athletics and academics, but more importantly, they said, it includes supporting academic resources on campus.

"Athletics gets the word out about K-State, but a strong library, newspaper, debate program and strong academic departments are why people choose to come here," Hock said.

Hock and Kraai said they both feel well-qualified to represent K-State students.

"I paid my way through undergraduate and now graduate school," Hock said. "I've worked long and hard. I know money's tight and that a $3 fee really means something. I represent the students and their interests."

"We're against career politicians," Kraai said. "We have no agenda except what's best for our fellow students."

The running mates said they are also confident of each other's ability to change SGA for the better. They said they respect each other and work well together.

"When Bill sets his mind to do something, he just goes crazy," Hock said.

"Trey will get the job done right," Kraai said.

"And he'll do it in style."

Hock summed up his reason for choosing to run this year.

"I love K-State," he said. "That's why I'm still here."

Sorority to raise $35,000 to help fund Oprah Home

JAMI BOYLES
Kansas State Collegian

Pi Beta Phi sorority has agreed to sponsor Manhattan Habitat for Humanity's Oprah Home.

The Pi Phis need to raise $35,000 to fund the home. They are planning letter-writing networks, donation drawings, a celebrity golf tournament and other fund-raising efforts to earn the money, said Aimee Jackson, senior in interior design and spokeswoman for Pi Phi.

Habitat for Humanity builds homes for families in need of affordable housing. The Oprah Home will be Manhattan's fifth home and will be at 504 S. Manhattan Ave.

Oprah Winfrey is lending her name to the program as part of her Angel Network, an effort to increase community service around the country.

"We were just really inspired when the Angel Network came out," Jackson said.

Although Winfrey offers no money to the program, the name recognition helps to get others involved, said Marcia Schuley, president of the Manhattan chapter.

Jackson said she informed Schuley about the program, which prompted the organization to apply to be an Oprah Home.

Pi Phi agreed to sponsor the house because three of the previous homes were for single mothers.

It wanted to be a women's organization known for helping women in need, Jackson said.

Schuley said she was pleased with Pi Phi's decision to sponsor the house.

Most of the other sole sponsors of Oprah Homes are big corporations. She said she thought these corporations would not have as much trouble raising $35,000.

Schuley said she thought it was impressive to have a sponsor who did not readily have the money to spare. The sorority will have to work hard to make the money.

The family chosen to live in the home is expected to be announced later this month.

The decision is based on need, willingness to participate in the program and ability to pay back the no-interest loan.

Clinton plans speeches to prepare U.S. possible military strike in Iraq

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Creeping closer to conflict with Iraq, White House advisers met Monday to plan a series of public events designed to brace the American public for risky military strikes against Saddam Hussein.

President Clinton begins a week of chest pounding by addressing American military leaders and personnel today at the Pentagon.

Wednesday the president's foreign policy team will conduct a town hall meeting in Columbus, Ohio.

"We will be increasing the pace of the dialogue both with the American people and the international community, so they will understand our determination to see that Iraq complies with United Nations Security Council resolutions," spokesman P.J. Crowley said.

Clinton was not expected to break new ground in today's address, but aides said it offered him the best opportunity yet to explain fully the objectives and risks of military action.

Aides said the president's speech would highlight these issues:

- The global danger posed by Hussein's suspected production of biological, chemical and nuclear weapons.

- Clinton's resolve to "diminish and reduce" Hussein's arsenal through air strikes, if necessary.

- His foremost desire to solve the matter diplomatically and put U.N. weapons inspectors back on the job of ferreting out Hussein's weapons.

- The risks to U.S. military personnel and Iraqi civilians in the event of air strikes. Military leaders have said in recent days that U.S. casualties should be expected.

Clinton is expected to echo the words of National Security Adviser Sandy Berger: "There is no cost-free, risk-free option."

Presidential candidates should specify goals

President's Day brought the first of a succession of important announcements — two candidates threw their hats into the ring for student body president and vice president.

On a campus with many outspoken and relevant campus leaders, those who are vying for the top Student Governing Association office need more than a general plan of action.

The student body has grown tired of hearing trite campaign slogans, general answers and vague phrases addressing campus issues. Most of us have heard it all before, and the low voter turn-out is evidence of how little students care.

The main challenge facing each presidential ticket is apathy. This campus needs a breath of fresh air.

We need a reason to care. A reason to get involved. A reason to get out and vote.

If you're serious about running for election — with any hope of winning — address real student concerns. Get involved. Be committed. Find out what students care about.

This campus needs leadership the students can believe in and get behind. Be original. Be a leader others can support.

The SGA election is not a popularity contest. Hopefully, we have a student body savvy enough to choose a candidate based on issues and ideas, not affiliations.

More than anything, this campus needs candidates willing to make a difference.

Leadership is responsibility and accountability, but real charisma is a rallying point for change.

Be prepared to follow through on all the points you outline on your specific platform. We need leaders who, once in office, are willing to work with everyone on campus.

Be willing to embrace different points of view.

This is a dynamic campus, and we need a leader who is willing to fight against the status quo of back-room politics.

The president should be able to stand up to scrutiny and to provide a voice representing the best for the student body.

It's better to BURN OUT than fade away

A few suggestions for other buildings that should be torched for urban improvement

Ever since the Aggieville business district inadvertently took the concept of "outdoor grill" to unhealthy new extremes last weekend, I've been flashing back to the Nichols Gymnasium fire of 1968.

It took me a while to figure out why — no, I haven't been a student here since that time — but checking the calendar refreshed my memory. Nichols was gutted on Dec. 13, a Friday, while the most recent Aggieville blaze began on the heels of another Friday the 13th.

Sniff. I smell a trend. A crispy, charcoaled trend. Or maybe I'm just getting in touch with my inner pyromaniac.

Let's disclaimer this idea right off the bat. Our community was very fortunate to extinguish the fire with no injuries or loss of life. We have excellent emergency services and a phalanx of tired firefighters to thank for jobs (ahem) well done.

But if an area building is going to get crispy on Friday the 13th, I say we democratize the process. Let's not let something this important rely on chance. It's a lot more fun than letting age and fatigue take their toll until (de)construction crews get all the fun. Let's take the initiative. On the night of the 12th, let's pick a building, evacuate it, clean it out and then bring our marshmallows.

To start the voting, I'll roll out my nominees.

● Denison Hall: They've been talking about tearing this building down for as long as I've been here, back when there was an Art Building still standing. Let's face it, if ever a building deserved obliteration, this one is it. It's a poster child for architecture bound by fiscal incompetence. Two words: flat roof. Normally I'd fear the wrath and ire of the department whose building I've advocated incinerating, but I know full well members of the Department of English will be waiting outside with little red cans of gasoline and flicking their Bics with eager smiles.

● Seaton Hall: The heart and soul of the College of Architecture, Planning and Design deserves a building that doesn't reek of "designed by committee." It's a building about which little can be universally said, because it's the remnants of several other buildings conglomerated into Frankenstein Hall.

Wandering through its corridors you can almost feel yourself passing through the walls of previous buildings assimilated into the Seaton collective.

I wouldn't be surprised if Seaton mysteriously grew during intersession. Lafene Health Center, be warned: resistance is futile. Get your matches, gang — the line must be drawn here.

(Interesting tangent — spell check does not acknowledge the word "Seaton" and immediately offers the alternative "Satan." Is that a sign?)

● Dickens Hall: Have you ever had a class on the third floor of Dickens Hall? Geography students must be some of the healthiest students on this campus.

I hate the staircase — I like being somewhat subtle in my transitions from class to class, but I know they can hear me in Bramlage Coliseum when I go galloping up that staircase.

Since physical education is no longer a requirement, a cartography class should impress the need for cardiovascular health.

This idea isn't completely without its drawbacks. Part and parcel of the college experience is buildings weathered with age and threatening to collapse upon themselves — wanting all-new buildings with state-of-the-art resources is a Defense Departmental delusion divorced from harsh economic reality.

We need to realize there's a line between inconvenient (floorboards creaking) and intolerable (falling through the floor).

And there are some buildings, no matter how antiquated, I can't see smoldering. Ahearn Field House will always have a spot of significance in my mind.

Despite its newfound rodent population, I'm endeared to the East Stadium. Nichols burning in 1968 was shocking — right now it'd just be redundant.

And let's steer clear of Ward Hall. I can handle Manhattan becoming another Dresden, Germany, but not another Chernobyl.

But those are just my three favorites, off the top of my head. Which would be your victims?

Would seeing Eisenhower Hall crumble under its own weight bring a smile to your face, or would the sight of flames flickering out the windows of Cardwell Hall light up your eyes in Carrie-like glee?

Cast your votes, grab your torches and bring some brats and mustard.

People should look to Jesus when dealing with drinkers

Often it seems that words cannot express what weighs heavily upon my soul. The words, though they might seem unspeakable, are there. It is rare to be able to express the burden of the soul with the strokes of a key.

Still I try. The longing within me is for a world dying without God ... and a church that does not seem to care.

I cannot keep silent.

Friday night and Saturday morning, I spent about four hours in Aggieville. I watched policemen put themselves in the line of danger to break up a drunken, racially motivated brawl.

I prayed with two drunk men, one of whom had passed out, in Hardee's. The man who was awake had tears in his eyes and said a solemn "Amen" when I finished praying. As I sat on a ledge across from Silverado Saloon and Fast Eddy's, I cried.

My prayers and tears came from a heart broken by the plight of these, the children of God, who have wandered so far.

However, I refuse to condemn them. I will cast no stones. Jesus himself, speaking of a woman caught in adultery, said, "The person who is sinless should cast the first stone at her" (John 8:7).

I am not sinless.

I cast no stones.

But, Jesus did pray for the people of his day. In the Gospel of Luke, we see a heartbroken prayer for the people. "Jerusalem, Jerusalem ... How I wanted to gather you together the way a hen gathers her chicks under her wings, but you were not willing" (Luke 13:34).

So I will pray ... and weep.

I have been reading Charles M. Sheldon's classic book, "In His Steps." In it, Sheldon spins a tale of a church in a fictitious town that decides to only act after asking what Jesus would do in each situation.

Though the book was published in 1896, the challenge is relevant for this modern age as well.

What would he do? Would he work five or even six days each week and sit in a padded pew on Sunday? It is a scenario which I can hardly imagine.

I can say without hesitation that if Jesus were to live in Manhattan, Kan., in 1998, he would not do as I have done for so long. He would spend more time in Aggieville bars than in our grandly built churches.

For so long, I have justified my actions and those of my friends with many Christian platitudes.

"You can't witness to a drunk person."

No, but you can pray with them.

"Being seen in a bar looks, well, you know ... bad."

I guess Jesus must have looked bad. In fact, the religious people accused him of being a drunk. He was not a drunk, but the people within the church of the time used the places that he hung out against him. Jesus loved the sick, the lonely and, yes, the drunk people. He even loved prostitutes. And he even loved the cheats. In fact, a tax collector was one of his twelve disciples (see Mark 2:13, 14).

He did not love them from afar. He got right in the middle of where they were. Jesus put it this way, "Healthy people don't need doctors; those who are sick do. I've come to call sinners, not people who think they don't have any flaws" (Mark 2:17).

He came to save those men who stumbled by me at 1:30 a.m., reeking of alcohol.

He came to save that man passed out on the table in Hardee's.

He came to save the woman who gave up her virginity to a man whom she never even sees anymore.

He came to save those of you who know something is wrong with your life. Those who know that there has to be more than living and dying and wonder what it could be. He came to save me.

Jesus came to save you. He loves you.

To those who would do as Jesus would, I say, "Arise." Wake from the slumber that keeps us from doing the works of Jesus.

The sick, lonely, hurting people need you. You will not find them in a campus Christian group. But you do not have to look far. Most of you live only a short drive from a local bar.

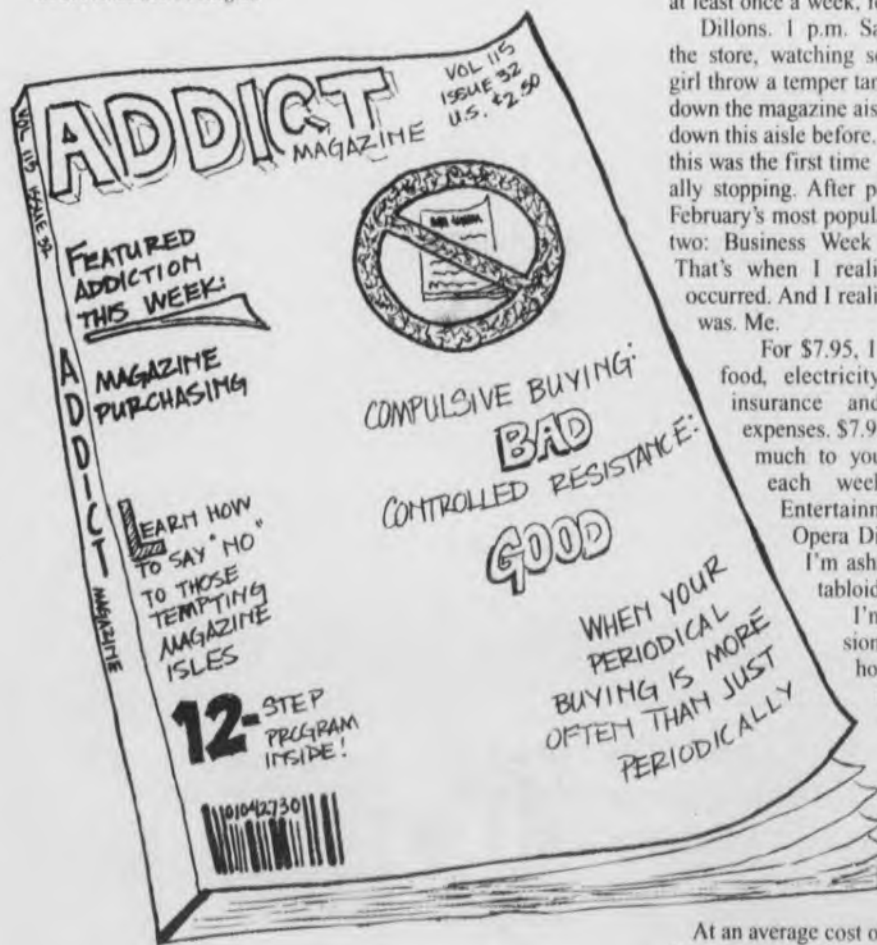

Find them. Go where they are. But, please don't go to throw the stones you have collected in your witnessing arsenal. Go as a man or woman of love and prayer.

And let your heart break with those things that break the heart of Jesus.

Please.

Addiction to magazines can rob readers of social life

SCOTT ANDERSON/Collegian

Last week I was robbed. Again. Imagine my horror when I realized I've been robbed by the same person, an addict, at least once a week, for the past 15 years.

Dillons. 1 p.m. Saturday. I'm cruising the store, watching some obnoxious little girl throw a temper tantrum, when I happen down the magazine aisle. I'm sure I've been down this aisle before. It looks familiar. But this was the first time I can remember actually stopping. After perusing a handful of February's most popular issues, I picked up two: Business Week and Woman's Day. That's when I realized the crime had occurred. And I realized who the criminal was. Me.

For $7.95, I had stolen from my food, electricity, cable, telephone, insurance and other necessary expenses. $7.95 might not seem like much to you, but consider this: each week I buy People, Entertainment Weekly, Soap Opera Digest, TV Guide, and I'm ashamed to admit it, the tabloid, Star.

I'm a radio and television major. Someday I hope to work in entertainment journalism. That's kind of an oxymoron — entertainment and journalism. But I have to know who's dating whom, what's hot and what's not. At an average cost of $2.50 each, though, I've spent $9,000 in the past 15 years on magazines alone. For that much money I could have made a dent in my college tuition or my car loan.

When my grandma and I go the grocery store, she'll buy me anything I want. Except magazines. I never knew why she refused me that pleasure. Self-robbery must run in the family, as she's now comparing my penchant for magazine purchasing to my mother's.

Ironically, the lead article in Business Week was about audience fragmentation and how entertainment companies are spending more money to get our attention. They had the nerve to ask, "What Will it Take to Win?" As far as I'm concerned, they've broken me down.

Of course there's a perfectly good explanation for my blowing all kinds of money on useless information. I'm an addict.

I don't drink. I don't smoke. Drugs don't appeal to me in the least. Yet I'm addicted to the latest news and entertainment that magazine publishers ship our way. I'm afraid I'm going to miss something. Those of us who gather in the K-State Student Union to watch "Days of Our Lives" know what I mean. You know that if we stopped watching for weeks or even months, we could pick it up again in a matter of days.

But we don't do that. Every day at noon, our biological soap clock leads us to the television. It's not normal what daytime programmers have done to us. Nor is it normal for us to seek out so much information on "South Park," "The X-Files," MTV or "ER." But it's happening.

I can't confine this addiction to traditional magazines. You'd think I was addicted to the rags that told me how to look my best, lose five pounds in five days or keep my relationship going strong. No, none of that self-betterment for me. If I did that, then I'd have no reason to stay at home on a Friday night with my friends Ben, Jerry and Cosmo. Instead, I want to rattle off the latest film info, industry gossip and know who was nominated for which award on what show.

As much as I know about them, surely Hollywood must care about how much money I've spent on industry magazines over the years. If I believe that, then you've got swamp land to sell me.

Single sales (what they call sales from newsstands) are much more expensive than subscriptions. That's the negative for the consumer, but the plus for the magazine, because that's how they make most of their money. Realizing this, I ought to try to subscribe to these magazines, right? Save myself a few big bucks?

I've tried. Subscriptions do work, but I usually don't get that far. Filling out the annoying little card, writing the check, putting a stamp on the envelope and sending it on its way has become too much of a chore (read: lazy). Besides, there's some sense of inner excitement I get every Monday when I go to Dillons for my favorite 'zines (read: get a life).

Just as I'm not limiting myself to traditional magazines, I don't limit my quest to in-store purchases. Internet surfing is no longer complete without checking USA Today's Life section, Yahoo! Entertainment and Showbizjobs.com (at least this one has employment listings, so I can pretend it's doing some good). What I don't pay for in newsstand rates, I'm paying for in time spent.

It's unfortunate there's not a 12-step program for people like me. It's truly an affliction. One that could affect my friends and family. Especially with my graduation. Don't get me wrong. I'm outta here in May. But other than a few classes and a great job, I'm having a hard time getting motivated. I'd rather read about Sami and Carrie or the making of "Titanic" than any chapter of plane trigonometry.

I said last week's trip to Dillons was the first when I could remember stopping to look at the magazines. That's no joke. I'm robotic when I'm in the store. I don't need to see what's on the cover. My arm moves toward the rack, and before I know it, the aliens have landed in the cart.

There's probably lots more I could do instead of reading so much gobbledegook. But why? The running joke with my friends is that I'm dating my couch. It does require reading material, even though I'm throwing away good money.

They say the first step to recovery is admitting you have a problem. I've got all kinds of problems, not the least of which is this addiction. But if I actually got up and did something, instead of pecking in the unimportant, what would I end up talking about?

Many students want to look good for spring break, but crash dieting might not be the answer.

"Dieters might lose a few pounds from water and muscle loss, but long term, they are not losing fat," said Dianna Schalles, registered dietitian at Lafene Health Center.

Crash dieting, according to Nutrition Services at Lafene, means to drastically cut back calories by eating less or using diet aids.

Laura Henrichs, senior in food and nutrition-exercise science, said the body is used to getting food, and when people use diet aids the nutrients might be there, but it causes the metabolism to slow down. She said drinking a 250-calorie shake is like drinking a glass of milk and eating a piece of bread, a fruit and a vegetable.

"In the long run, when someone eats again after using Slim-Fast, their body will only burn a few calories and they will gain weight," Henrichs said.

Schalles said liquid nutrition supplements such as shakes and teas might be useful in losing a few pounds, but weight gain is common once regular diet is resumed. She said it can be dangerous to rely on quick fixes, such as herbal supplements that haven't been proven effective.

"When people don't eat the minimum amount of calories required, then they could have low blood sugar," Schalles said. "This could cause tiredness and nausea."

Schalles said a long-term effect of crash dieting is known as the yo-yo effect, which is not good for the body. She said without exercise and healthy eating, muscles' mass can deplete.

"To maintain weight, people must make lifestyle changes to focus on a healthy relationship with food and exercise. It's the same boring advice people don't like to hear," Schalles said.

"With dieting, a key question to ask yourself is, is this something I can do for life, and most of the time it isn't."

Schalles said there is a growing number of men who are dieting, but there is more pressure for women to look a certain way.

Brian Oehme, junior in mechanical engineering, said he has been working out for six years, and the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex is so crowded lately that he now has to wait in line.

"After winter break, I've had six or seven friends ask me for work out programs to get ready for spring break," Oehme said. "They mainly want to work on abs and arms, but one month of working out is not going to do much."

Henrichs said to lose weight, do any aerobic exercise for 30 minutes, five times a week. To maintain weight, do aerobic exercise for 30 minutes, three times a week.

Oehme said, "If people would do it right in the first place, they wouldn't have to get ready for spring break."

Planning woes ruin enjoyment of spring break vacation

ALECIA TERRELL
Kansas State Collegian

Last year, Stacey Chapman and 13 of her friends were ready to hit the beaches of Mazatlán, Mexico. Spring break was days away, and the travel agent had all of the arrangements made. Things were running smoothly — until they arrived at Kansas City International Airport to leave.

"We went to get on our flight and found out it had been delayed for one hour. Some people didn't even get on the flight. I guess Student Express, the company we went through, had chartered a plane through TWA," Chapman, senior in elementary education, said.

Chapman said the trip was a disaster from day one. She said Mazatlán wasn't really a vacation spot for spring breakers, and everything was dirty in the area she was staying in. Right before they left from KCI, they also found out their hotel was being renovated, and they would have to stay somewhere else.

"It was so awful," she said. "I wouldn't recommend Mazatlán to anyone. The biggest annoyance were all of the delays we didn't count on. It's the last thing you want to have to worry about."

Meredith Dickey, Chapman's roommate and senior in speech pathology, also went on the trip.

"I remember the weather being bad, which wasn't what we had in mind," Dickey said. "Also, the staff at the hotel didn't speak English very well. This made things even more frustrating."

Picking the right travel agent can be essential when planning a big trip. Sunchase, a national vacation agency, has been in business for 18 years.

Risha Benteley, a representative for Sunchase, said most people have problems with their payment deadlines.

"We require a $50 per person deposit and then people can send in their payments through the mail or over the phone," she said. "If people want to cancel, they need to let us know 36 days prior to the trip to get their money refunded. This is where most of the problems come into play."

Adelma Starnes, travel agent with Creative Travel Inc., in Manhattan, said it offers a $25 insurance coverage in case problems occur.

"Most students don't want to pay this amount on top of the total amount they've already paid because they think nothing will go wrong," she said. "With the insurance, we can guarantee most of their money being refunded. Without it, they could be in a world of hurt."

Starnes said her company goes over all of the details with customers before their trip. She mentioned some hotels having a $1,500 deposit.

"In Acapulco, you can't even rent a hotel room if you're under 25," she said. "Most people don't realize some of these things."

Though some trips might end up in disaster, others might flow according to plan.

"My Mazatlán trip may have been horrible," Chapman said, "but I have also been to Cancún through an agency called Fun Jet, and it was awesome."

Whether going to Mazatlán, Cancún or Timbuktu, agencies recommend students ask plenty of questions and be aware of deposits and payment deadlines.

"This year we're driving ourselves to Colorado," Chapman said. "We thought we'd stay in the U.S."

Foul-plagued Raef LaFrentz finished with 13 points, and Billy Thomas had 16 for the Jayhawks (28-3, 12-1 Big 12), who beat Colorado for the 18th-straight time and improved to 7-0 since LaFrentz returned from a broken right hand.

MELVIN: SCORED 17 AGAINST KANSAS.

Harry Caray still in critical condition

RANCHO MIRAGE, Calif. — A sudden change in heart rhythm was blamed for the collapse of Chicago Cubs announcer Harry Caray.

Caray was stricken during a Valentine's Day dinner with his wife, Dutchie.

The 78-year-old announcer remained in critical but stable condition Monday at Eisenhower Medical Center. His condition has remained unchanged since he was admitted on Saturday night after falling at the Basin Street West nightclub.

Nursing supervisor Jane Taylor confirmed Caray's condition but declined further comment.

Family spokesman Bill Wills said "a sudden change in heart rhythm, which seriously affected his circulation," caused the Hall of Fame broadcaster to collapse. Caray has not been able to breathe on his own since being admitted to the hospital, he said.

"His heart output is normal now," Wills said.

Doctors were unsure what caused the problem. Caray had a stroke in 1987, but doctors have ruled out another stroke, Wills said.

"No one has even suggested that," he said.

Dutchie Caray, her daughters and three grandchildren were handling the situation well, Wills said.

"I think the fortunate thing is Dutchie is a strong person to begin with. Her two daughters and grandchildren happened to be visiting here. ... It's been a great diversion, three kids running around, keeping grandma busy," he said.

HOCKEY: The games for fun are over; the games for gold begin Wednesday. In the last of the games for seeding, Teemu Selanne had a goal and two assists as Finland whipped Kazakhstan 8-2.

Late Monday, the preliminary round wrapped up with Russia edging the Czech Republic 2-1, while defending gold medalist Sweden beat Belarus 5-2. The other two matchups in the first round of the single elimination tournament: Russia (3-0) will play Belarus (0-3) and Sweden (2-1) meets Finland (1-2).

Sweden will be playing without defenseman Ulf Samuelsson, who was ruled ineligible early today because of a citizenship problem. But the International Ice Hockey Federation opted to allow Sweden to keep its points, which in turn kept the quarterfinal matchups intact.

SPEEDSKATING: Shut out through its first six races in Nagano, America's historically most successful Winter Games team finally broke its 1998 hex with an unexpected bronze from Chris Witty in the 1,500 meters. Marianne Timmer of the Netherlands set a world record of 1 minute, 57.58 seconds to win the gold. Gunda Niemann-Stirnemann of Germany was second.

FREESTYLE SKIING: Three Americans survived the preliminaries in the freestyle skiing aerials: Britt Swartley and Eric Bergoust on the men's side, Nikki Stone for the women.

Swartley was in second place and Bergoust in fourth going into Wednesday's medal competition. Stone was in fourth after a treacherous opening round that featured some scary spills — including one that blew out American skier Mariano Ferrario's knee and patella tendon.

BIATHLON: Heavy snow stopped the men's 10-kilometer biathlon after several skiers had started the race.

Rowing team hustles, takes 2nd place in weekend meet

KELLY DICKSON
Kansas State Collegian

The basketball game was not the only time last weekend that Kansas and K-State were battling for a win.

The rowing team finished second in the Midwest Indoor Rowing Championships at Allen Fieldhouse in Lawrence.

Indoor rowing is done on ergometers, or rowing machines, as individuals and as relay teams. Each race is 2,000 meters, except for the coxswains, who only row 1,000 meters.

"Indoors is a lot more team-orientated. It is nice because everyone can watch everybody else race. Outside you are away from the course, and you are trying to keep your boat together," junior Sara Swan said.

"Overall, the actual race is very individual, but you are trying to win the team trophy. My own roommate beat me, and I wouldn't have wanted anybody else to."

Senior Heather Brunk repeated as a champion. This year it was in the varsity open-weight race. Brunk was the novice open-weight champion last year.

"I was kind of nervous because once you win there is pressure to perform. Not directly but because I wanted to do at least as well as I did last year. So there was a little pressure there," Brunk said.

Freshman novice Laura Pavlyak was also a champion in the novice open-weight race.

"She did really great. She has only been out rowing for two or three weeks, so that is really awesome that she did that well," Brunk said.

Coaches had talked to Pavlyak in the fall about rowing, but back problems stopped her from trying out. K-State coach Jenny Hale talked to Pavlyak again after break about being a spring walk-on.

"I wasn't expecting to do very well because I have no experience. I never even really used rowing machines. I think being on the water will be very different," Pavlyak said.

Pavlyak's time was only six-tenths of a second slower than Brunk's and was faster than Swan, who placed second behind Brunk in the varsity open weight.

"It wasn't prevalent that I do better than her. I really just wanted to beat my time from last year. I am really excited to have that kind of potential coming up behind us," Brunk said.

The strength of the varsity and novice squads' performances sets a tone for the rest of the season, Swan said.

"I am very excited to get on the water. There were some novices, and some varsity too, that stepped up and showed that hard work really pays off. We trained hard this winter, and we are in the best shape we ever have been," Swan said.

K-STATE'S ANGIE FINKES FIGHTS FOR A LOOSE BALL WITH MISSOURI'S TAMIKA JOHNSON ON SUNDAY. ALTHOUGH FINKES SHOT ONLY THREE-OF-14 FROM THE FIELD IN THE FIRST HALF AGAINST THE TIGERS, SHE LED THE WILDCATS WITH 18 POINTS AND EIGHT REBOUNDS DURING THE 66-57 WIN IN BRAMLAGE COLISEUM.

Even with depth, foul problems, K-State women sneak past Tigers

► COALSON, JACOBSON, FINKES SECURE WILDCAT WIN, BREAK 5-GAME LOSING STREAK.

SUN DEE MILLS
Kansas State Collegian

When the senior player is on the bench in foul trouble and a young team lets go of a 14-point lead — a familiar theme for the Wildcat women's basketball team — all a coach can do is pray to the basketball gods for help.

K-State coach Deb Patterson might have done that, but she credits specific players with the victory over Missouri on Sunday.

"What you saw at the end of the game was a determined effort not to lose," she said. "Jenny Coalson and Britt Jacobson stepped up and made that happen."

Coalson, a junior guard forward, was officially credited with 10 steals, setting a career high and tying a K-State record set by Cassandra Jones in 1985.

But Patterson said Coalson might have had more steals than that, and the coach was impressed with her hustle on the court.

"She was always driving to the foul line," Patterson said. "This was a huge game for her."

Jacobson found herself in foul trouble early in the game — again, a common occurrence for the senior guard. During this time, the Tigers closed an 11-point lead to two points in about two minutes.

"It was a different game," Patterson said. "When Missouri made their big run, Britt was out of the game."

However, the most alarming facet of the game for Patterson was sophomore post player Angie Finkes' three-for-14 field goal percentage at the half.

"I felt like I almost forgot how to shoot a layup in the first half," Finkes said. "I missed quite a few."

Patterson said she was impressed with the character her team showed and the determination not to let the game go.

"The good news was, our guards didn't give up on our post players, and our post players didn't give up shooting when they got looks," she said. "It wouldn't have worked if Angie had checked out after 20 minutes. That would have been easy for her to do after going three-of-14."

Not only did the K-State offense eventually take advantage of the good looks at the basket the posts were getting, but the defense clogged passing lanes to get the team 21 steals.

"We had some breakdowns at some points, but I think we played a good defensive game," Finkes said. "The defense we played — we just packed it in the lane."

That created the offense, Patterson said. "Britt stepped in front of a couple of passing lanes," she said. "We created better offense with our defense."

The win was important — all at this point in the season are, Patterson said — but the players would've liked to have gotten the win a little differently.

"We've lost three games within a nine-point spread," freshman guard Kim Woodlee said. "We said, 'OK, it's a one-point game. We're going to step up and win this one.' We just made it harder on ourselves."

Watching Aggieville burn puts KU, K-State game in perspective

I've always been so-so on Valentine's Day. Until now. I know I'm supposed to talk sports. I know I need to talk about Raef LaFrentz, the phony dollar bill of Lester Earl and Willie the Wildcat wearing a Cupid outfit.

But, you'll have to excuse me this once. I'm tired. Very tired. I was rudely awakened at around 4 a.m. on Valentine's Day to screaming people outside my Aggieville penthouse. I'm used to students' drunk screams. I'm used to police sirens at 2 a.m. I'm used to hearing after-hours parties and blaring music from next door. And I knew K-State played Kansas in eleven hours.

But this was 4 a.m.

Aggieville was on fire. I looked out my window. I wiped my eyes and looked again. Fifty feet from my window was the Aggieville Fire of '98.

Why is it stuff like this always seems to happen before or after K-State plays KU?

In 1969, after the KU vs. K-State game, a group of students set fire to a stack of cardboard boxes, starting a bonfire at the intersection of 12th and Moro streets in front of the old Kite's bar, leading to hundreds of students participating in the first Running of the Wildcats down Moro.

There was the riot of 1986, when students tipped over a defenseless Volkswagen bug on Moro.

Students used to swing dead chickens over their heads and throw them on the Ahearn Field House court during KU vs. K-State basketball games. But all that seemed minor at the moment. Aggieville was on fire.

All anyone could do was stand and watch, just like they would do eleven hours later in Bramlage Coliseum.

Three fire trucks lined the 1100 block of Moro; firefighters poured onto the street and before long, hoses began shooting water into the blaze across the street.

What a mess. Thirty minutes later, just when it looked like the fire was under control, the blaze hit Club Karrington's liquor cabinet and a 100-foot fireball surged from the roof of the 83-year-old building.

The entire front of the building collapsed, and a stream of fire and a ton of bricks spilled onto Moro, just feet from six firefighters, who just looked at one another and kept spraying their hose.

"Dude, Aggieville is going to burn down," a guy said while dodging the flaming embers that showered the street of spectators.

"Man, it's going to get the Lou," another guy said while smoking a cigarette. "Man, this whole place is going to burn."

For now, everybody watched and inhaled smoke, and a police officer ordered everyone to move down the street to the front of Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon while the flames grew. The wind blew, ashes spread over neighboring buildings, and I watched a few floating embers land on top of my apartment roof.

After making a dozen phone calls, I finally got ahold of a photographer. She came running down Moro with about five cameras draped across her body and began shooting pictures wildly like it was a Calvin Klein modeling event.

Then more photographers arrived and were posted outside my apartment window like snipers, shooting historical pictures of the killer blaze that claimed one of Aggieville's oldest structures. The following blaze looked to cover the entire block.

Club Karrington, Adventure Travel and Greek's Pizzeria were gone.

The Futon Store, On the Wildside, and Pyramid Pizza had a chance. The Pizza Hut windows cracked, and the Varsity Theatre sign melted like a block of provolone.

I had a Greek's pizza seven hours before the fire. It was good pizza.

The crowd chanted, "SAVE THE WILD-

SIDE! SAVE THE LOU!"

Smiling students posed for group pictures like they had just survived the 8.3 Richter Scale horror ride, Earthquake, at Universal Studios.

It was close to 6 a.m. and silence crept across the sparse field of spectators along Moro Street. Police tape outlined the city block. Water continued to nurse the smoldering pile of rubble. Smoke was everywhere.

Aggieville had survived the Fire of '98 and sobered observers shook their heads.

"Hey, dude," somebody said to his buddy. "Don't we play KU today?"

Former boarding house full of Manhattan history

THE WOLF HOUSE MUSEUM CAN BE FOUND ON THE CORNER OF FREMONT STREET AND JULETTE AVENUE IN MANHATTAN.

VOLUNTEERS GIVE NEW LIFE TO STORIES OF HISTORIC HOUSE IN MANHATTAN.

AMANDA DAVIDSON
Kansas State Collegian

A great deal of history resides inside the walls of the two-story Wolf House Museum, and although the walls might not talk, many volunteers are ready and willing to give Manhattan area residents a tour of the fascinating historical landmark.

When Kansas became a state in 1861, more people started moving to Kansas and Manhattan. By 1867, there were 1,500 residents of Manhattan and more moving in every week. John and Sophia Frank moved to Manhattan in late 1867 and were the first residents of what is now known as the Wolf House.

Upon arrival in Manhattan, the Franks hired John Diehl to build them a home. The project was started in January and finished June 3, 1868, and it cost the Franks a total of $798.50 for their new two-story home.

In 1870, the Franks realized the need for a boarding house in Manhattan. Travelers and future residents building homes needed somewhere to stay for the month, week or even just the night. With a few added rooms, the Frank's home was turned into Manhattan's only boarding house.

The Franks charged travelers 25 cents for a noon meal or for a bed for the night. To stay in the boarding house for the whole week it would cost $3. The boarding house served its purpose for five years before closing its doors.

Dr. G.H. and Ellen Perry were the next to own the home and stayed until 1922. The Perrys then handed the house down to their daughter, Elizabeth Perry Harling. In 1938, John Hepler, a professor at K-State, became the home's new owner and lived there with his family for three years. Finally, in 1941, the house was sold to Max and Lucile Wolf.

Lucile Wolf donated the historical house to the Riley County Historical Society in 1982. In 1984, the Wolf House Historical Museum opened.

The Wolf House tours are full of stories and secrets of past residents. Once inside the front doors, volunteers take tourists through six different rooms. Each room conveys a story of how the original owners, John and Sophia Frank, lived their everyday lives. The house is fully equipped with the antique appliances and possessions of the late 1800s.

Virginia Quiring is a volunteer for the Wolf House and is also a retired K-State librarian.

"I enjoy telling the history of this home and educating the tourist about the way people lived in the late 1800s," Quiring said.

Special exhibits are planned each summer to enhance interest and educate people on a certain historical topic. The exhibits and tours are all done by volunteers who donate their time to educate people on Manhattan's history.

Edna Williams is the curator and has donated her time and energy to the Wolf House since its 1984 opening.

"Last year, we had an exhibit on the different hats worn in the late 1800s. It went over really well," Williams said. "The guided tours of the Wolf House are free and a great way to spend a Saturday or Sunday afternoon."

Web version of JEOPARDY! offers college students opportunity to win prizes for point-and-click trivia

CORBIN H. CRABLE

Answer: A famous game show that is now online and spawning nationwide competition from more than 10,000 college students everywhere.

Question: What is College JEOPARDY! Online?

The televised game show can now be played via the Internet and is sponsored by Pontiac and Sprint.

Here's the outline: one game, or tournament, is played each semester. The spring tournament, which began on Feb. 2 and runs through April 13, is divided into three regions, based on the location of the college: Eastern, Central and Western. There is no limit to the number of players that may represent each school.

The fall tournament champion was University of Florida freshman Jordan Silverstein. For receiving first place as an individual player, Silverstein received a 1998 Pontiac Sunfire convertible.

The grand prize for the spring tournament is a 1999 Pontiac Grand Am. Other prizes include a $10,000 scholarship to the school with the top average score.

Scores are posted on the weekly top-10 board, and prizes are also given to the top-10 individual players of the week. Every week, five of the top-10 players receive $100 in Sprint long-distance telephone services, and five receive an AM/FM Sony Walkman. Also posted on the board are the high score of the day and the week's "featured player."

Students from each of the three regions who appear on the weekly top-10 lists will be automatically entered into the semifinals at the end of the tournament. The 100 top-ranking players from each region who did not appear on the regional top-10 list, known as the "Wildcard 300," are also eligible to go on to the semifinals.

The three top-ranking scorers from the semifinals round will then go on to the finals. The location of the finals round has not yet been announced.

How does K-State rank so far with the tournament now well into its second week? On the top-100 list, K-State, which is in the Western division, is ranked 42nd. Ohio Wesleyan University, in the Central division, has the first-place title.

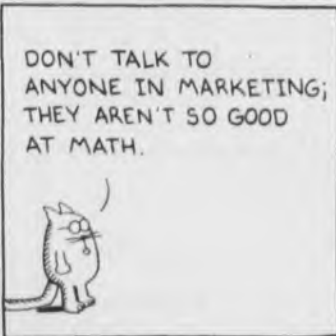

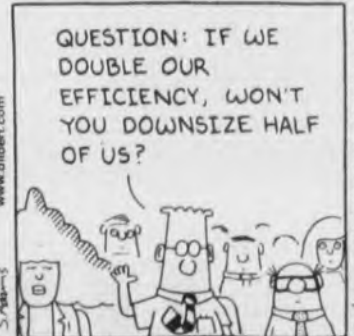

For those who want to train for the tournament, College JEOPARDY! Online offers a boot camp, where experts and players from past tournaments offer tips on how to prepare and what to study and even provide various study sites.

Also included on the College JEOPARDY! Online site is a chat room, where players may trade secrets with other JEOPARDY! buffs from across the country.

Insane Clown Posse turns K.C. venue into house of horrors, lake of Faygo

PHIL KELLUM
Kansas State Collegian

The wagons of the Dark Carnival rolled into Kansas City, Kan., on Wednesday night and made a stop at Memorial Hall.

And the kids came out in full force to be terrorized and drenched in Faygo.

Insane Clown Posse, Psycho Realm and Twiztid rocked the crowd with the "three acts" of the House of Horrors world tour.

A voice from somewhere introduced the crowd to the House of Horrors and the first act, Detroit's Twiztid.

Two monks walked out and flanked the stage before the duo of Bones and Hektik. Twiztid threatened to beat up two separate crowd members for throwing a glow stick on stage and shining a laser pointer at them.

Bones and Hektik rocked a too-short, 15-minute set of wicked rhymes and beats.

After a short delay, Los Angeles' Psycho Realm took the stage as the second act.

The group tore through yet another too-short, 15-minute set of some great hip hop. Of course, songs were dedicated to "all the weed smokers in the house" and all that. All of the tracks were from the new Psycho Realm record.

At this point, I thought Myzery was going to play, but it was a no-show. Myzery had been part of the tour and was on the fliers for the Kansas City show but was nowhere to be seen.

Insane Clown Posse took the stage after an introduction from Freak and Angie the Phone Girl from the syndicated national radio show Mancow's Morning Madhouse.

The stage was dark while a long intro tape played. The crowd chanted "ICP! ICP!" over and over. Finally the stage was illuminated to reveal probably the biggest stage set I have ever seen.

It was set up to look like a huge haunted house, complete with candelabras and even a monstrous stained glass window with the Great Milenko logo on it. Of course, there was also a huge refrigerator and fireplace filled with two-liter bottles of Faygo soda pop.

Insane Clown Posse opened with "Dead Body Man," and Violent J and Shaggy 2 Dope walked out on stage in monster masks, along with other various folks on stage in clown costumes and zombies and monks wandering the stage. It was great. The whole time, the band sprayed the crowd with Faygo, much to its delight.

After a few songs, the music cut to some silly circus music, and it was time for a Faygo break. Six clowns came out on stage with buckets of Faygo and doused Insane Clown Posse with it. It was hysterical.

The last song was "Pass Me By" from ICP's newest album, and Violent J and Shaggy brought out Twiztid, Psycho Realm and a cast of characters to shower the crowd with that last spray of Faygo, including huge water guns and tubs of the stuff.

After exactly an hour, ICP left the stage, the house lights came up and everyone left sticky from Faygo, hoarse from screaming along and still wanting more.

It was a great show, but it was over by 10 p.m.

Acts protect students from fraudulent calls, restrict telemarketers

JOHN FRASSON
Kansas State Collegian

Telemarketing companies use more than 15,000 lists of consumers' information to call people.

The odds are that some K-State students are on those lists.

According to the Direct Marketing Association, the largest trade association for direct marketers, there are a total of 2 billion names on these lists. The names are obtained from phone directories, public records, membership lists of various associations, lists that businesses and organizations sell to telemarketing companies, and lists that different telemarketing companies rent or exchange with each other.

"As soon as I realize it's a telemarketer in any fashion — whether AT&T, gutters or whatever — I tell them I'm not interested and hang up," Jon Kulaga, assistant dean of student life, said. "I think most students have accepted it as a part of life."

Students aren't at the mercy of these lists, though.

There are ways to reduce telemarketing calls and to deal with telemarketers when they call, according to two federal acts. The Telephone Consumer Protection Act of 1991 and the Telemarketing and Consumer Fraud Abuse Prevention Act of 1995 protect consumers and mandate certain guidelines for telemarketers.

Students may be tempted to get angry, hang up or say, "I'm not interested," when a telemarketer calls. However, telemarketers have the legal right to call back unless they're told by consumers to put them on their "do not call" list. These lists must be kept on file by the telemarketing company for 10 years, disallowing them from calling again. If a company violates this guideline more than once a year, consumers may file suit in state court.

However, companies are exempt from this guideline if they call using an automatic dialer, which dials random numbers.

Trent Howerton, senior in management, said he thinks a telemarketer dialed his number randomly to get him to sign up for a credit card.

"This lady called me up, and she woke me up," he said. "I said, 'Yeah, you can have my information, that's all right.'"

Howerton said he thought the telemarketer was going to send him information, but he later found out an account had been created.

"I didn't know I had actually signed up for it," he said.

"I called them up immediately and said, you know, just take me off, I don't want to sign up."

On another occasion, Howerton's long-distance service was changed without him knowing.

"They were charging outrageous rates," he said. "They said I had switched and I had verified it over the phone. I told them I didn't remember ever doing that."

Complaints concerning a telemarketing company may be directed to several agencies, including the Kansas attorney general and the state Better Business Bureau. Consumers may also file complaints with the Federal Communications Commission, which enforces the 1991 act, and the Federal Trade Commission, which enforces the 1995 act.

Tips the FTC offers for dealing with telemarketers include resisting high-pressure sales tactics, taking time to listen to the call and finding out about the company one is dealing with.

"I'm real careful now about saying yes, even if they're just asking me basic questions," Howerton said.

THINGS TO KNOW

The "do not call" list isn't the only guideline the two federal acts mandate. Among the other guidelines:

- Telemarketers may call only between 8 a.m. and 9 p.m.

- Telemarketers must tell if they are selling something, what is being sold and its total cost.

- Telemarketers must tell their name, what company is calling and the company's phone number.

- Artificial or prerecorded messages to residences are prohibited in most cases.

Another way consumers can reduce telemarketing calls is to contact the Telephone Preference Service, run by the Direct Marketing Association. This service distributes lists of people who do not wish to receive calls from solicitors. Consumers can send their name, telephone number (with area code) and address to:

New Greek homecoming law passed

► NEW LAW REQUIRES PAIRING OF FRATERNITIES.

KELLY REDDING
Kansas State Collegian

A new Homecoming bidding-system law was passed at a joint Panhellenic and Interfraternity Council meeting Jan. 26.

According to the law, all fraternities are required to pair up with at least one other fraternity of their choice. The two fraternities would then pair up with a sorority, but the total number of participants involved cannot exceed 310.

Jami Nelson, senior in mass communications and executive secretary of Panhellenic Council, said the law was created to try to keep Homecoming groups from becoming too large.

"Our biggest concern was that pairing up and bidding of the houses," she said. "We had four different proposals, and a representative from each house got to vote for one. This is the one that passed, and it passed by a landslide."

There were three other proposals that didn't pass. The first proposal involved letting fraternities have the choice to pair up, and there would be no limit on the number of participants.

The second proposal required all fraternities to pair up with sororities without having a limit on the number of participants involved.

The third proposal passed.

The fourth proposal involved IFC and the Panhellenic Council establishing a minimum number of participants and would give the fraternities two weeks to pair up with sororities. After that date, the remaining fraternities would be assigned a partner.

Nelson said she thought the proposal would help the process go smoother.

"I think that this will even the number out," Nelson said. "I think it's going to work out."

Deborah Madden, sophomore in business, marketing and international business and Homecoming chair at Kappa Kappa Gamma, said her house didn't like the third proposal as well as the others.

"It's probably not as fair for the fraternities," she said. "It's not the option that we voted for. We liked proposal number four better, but I'm sure that this will work out in the long run."

Josh Wilson, sophomore in business and member of Phi Delta Theta, said he was in favor of the new proposal.

"It affects us because it helps our chances with a fair and equal Homecoming," he said.

Campus directory source of telemarketing callers

► K-STATE NOT PARTNER WITH TELEPHONE SALES.

JOHN FRASSON
Kansas State Collegian

Students in residence halls who have received telemarketing calls might wonder how companies got their phone numbers. Because they aren't listed in city phone directories, residence hall dwellers might come to believe the university is selling their numbers.

Don Foster, university registrar, found humor in the notion.

"We haven't tapped that source of income yet," he said.

Foster said telemarketers get students' numbers from an easily obtainable public source of information — the Campus Directory. The directory is published online as well as on paper.

"What we have learned over the last four or five years, that even with the paper ones, those are scanned, and it becomes an electronic process, so it's very easy for somebody just to take the paper and create an electronic file from it," he said.

In the Registrar's Office, students can obtain and fill out a non-disclosure request form. If the form is submitted within 10 days after the beginning of the fall semester, the student's directory information will be withheld from the Campus Directory.

This might be effective if you live in a residence hall. However, for students living outside the halls, withholding directory information will probably not reduce telemarketing calls, Foster said.

"There are so many ways that they get addresses that even if we choose not to disclose it here, the chances of your not being called by a telemarketer are very small," he said.

Foster said there might be negative aspects to filling out the form. Not only does it keep one's name, address and phone number confidential, but also it withholds all information. If a non-disclosure form is filled out, the Registrar's Office will neither confirm nor deny a student's affiliation with K-State.

"There are just a lot of things that go out that we would not provide if the student has required non-disclosure," Foster said. "I think students think very carefully before they decide it should not be released at all."

There are, however, circumstances that would make non-disclosure necessary, and a handful of students fill out the form each semester, Foster said.

"There is the question of people who are being stalked or harassed. There's the question of people who have a need to remain anonymous," he said.

Most students, though, will find it a disadvantage to withhold their information.

"It's really more beneficial for it to be disclosed," Foster said.

New state driving law makes teens practice for licenses; age not raised for eligibility

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — A bill that would change Kansas law for young drivers passed out of a Senate committee Monday, but in a form far less restrictive than what was originally proposed.

The bill would require drivers with learners' permits to undergo 20 hours of driving with a licensed driver who was at least 21 before the teen could get a restricted license.

Holders of farm permits would be exempt.

Also under the bill, teens who have two moving violation convictions while they have restricted licenses would have to wait until they are 17 to get a full license.

Breaking the rule that holders of restricted licenses can't transport non-family members under 18 would become a moving violation.

The bill now goes to the full Senate for debate.

The American Automobile Association of Kansas helped draft the original bill, which sought to raise the age for a full driver's license to 17 and required those with learner's permits to get 50 hours of supervised driving before they could get their restricted license.

Sen. Robert Tyson, R-Parker, offered an amendment Monday that would keep most of the current law intact.

"I felt it was getting too complicated for the young person to get those requirements in," Tyson said. "I wasn't sure the system was broke and needed fixing."

The Senate Transportation and Tourism committee had heard hours of testimony on both sides, and seemed unable to reach agreement. AAA eventually gave up their hope of raising the driving age, but hung tough on a requirement for 40 hours of supervised driving.

The Kansas Farm Bureau had been against any supervised driving requirement, but said it could live with 20 hours.

AAA spokesman Mitch Fuqua said he was working with other senators to reinstate the 40-hour requirement.

"It's a small step in the right direction," Fuqua said of the committee's action.

I WASN'T SURE THE SYSTEM WAS BROKE AND NEEDED FIXING.

SGA at K-State empowered by constituency, student leaders say

Student Senate Vice Chair Tracey Mann said the administration chooses to give SGA a lot of power.

"Until we do something irresponsible to have that power taken away, we will probably always have it," he said.

Riemann said student senators and other elected officials have power because of their ability to set fees and regulations. He said the executive branch only has power in the sense that he and Neufeld can veto Student Senate legislation.

Riemann said power not only involves the responsibilities of setting fees and making decisions. It also involves research and knowledge, he said.

"If you have a committee who's working on an issue, and they've worked really hard and did their research, and they've got all of their loose ends tied up, then they have a lot of power," Riemann said.

"On the other hand, if you have one person or one committee that's just kind of pushing an issue that they don't really understand, or they don't really know, then they don't have that power because they haven't worked to establish that legitimacy," he said.

Riemann and Neufeld said they felt power at K-State is well-balanced, but Mann said he wished student government had more power over academic affairs.

"I wish we had more power to improve advising and more say in the Course Information Program," he said. "I wish we had more jurisdiction over things we're directly affected by."

Though SGA does have a lot of power, Riemann said power shouldn't be the reason students run for an office.

"They should rethink if they're wanting to run for power," he said.

Lisa VanMeter, assistant governmental relations director on Riemann's cabinet, said students shouldn't have a desire for power when running for an office.

"You have to have a desire to work hard and give up a lot of time. You have more responsibilities rather than power," she said.

"You are a guiding force on campus. A lot is expected of you."

As with any institution that has power, there are checks and balances. The administration acts as a check on SGA, but some student leaders said they felt the Collegian should act as a check on student government.

Riemann said because the Collegian is funded by student fees, it creates an interesting relationship between it and the student government, and the newspaper should act as a check.

"That should be done in a very rational sense and a very truthful sense. I think it's absolutely imperative that the concept of the free press be maintained, and it's actually imperative for that free press to be critical of what government does," Riemann said.

Dougan said he didn't like the term watchdog used to refer to the newspaper acting as a check on government.

"When watchdog is mentioned, it infers that there is some type of wrongdoing going on that has to be dug up, and that's not the case," he said.

With the Collegian and the administration acting as a check on student government, and student government's responsibility to make decisions, set fees and allocate money for a student body of 20,000, where, ultimately, is the power?

VanMeter said the power lies with whoever takes the most active interest in student government.

"That is typically the administration. The students would have more power if they had more interest. The ones with the power are the ones with the initiative," she said.

Riemann said everyone has the power.

"I think Jennafer and I have tried to define power as the ability to represent. In that sense we all have the power," he said.

"So where is the power? The power is truly with the student body."

Status of library fee still uncertain despite decision

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Kansas State Collegian

Though legislation for a student privilege fee to fund Hale Library died at Monday's Privilege Fee Committee meeting, it is still unclear if that will seal the proposed fee's fate.

Monday's news that the committee failed to second a motion in support of a library student fee sharply divided the University Library Committee at its meeting Tuesday.

A student fee is seen by library administration as the third leg of a three-leg funding plan to offset the rising costs of journal subscriptions. That plan includes the Kansas Legislature ($328,000 per year), the KSU Foundation (about $300,000), and a proposed $320,000 student fee.

After a report by Privilege Fee Committee Vice Chair Aaron Truax outlining the reasons for his committee's actions, library committee members expressed both support and concern for the decision.

"I have some concern if the vote of the Privilege Fee Committee really represents student opinion," Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, said.

Student opinion on fee uncertain

Hobrock said he and Karen McCulloh, library committee secretary, attended an Engineering College Council meeting Monday where they discussed the library's options.

Laura Buller, president of the engineering council, said the council took an informal show of hands of who would support a student fee. She said the results showed most of the council is in favor of the fee.

What do we think?

The Collegian editorial board gives a call for action on the library fee. See Page 4.

supporting the fee at a meeting Sunday. Those students attended Monday's fee committee meeting and spoke in defense of the fee.

A bill to create a student fee doesn't need to come from a committee. Any student senator can propose bills and have them placed on the agenda by the Student Senate chair.

Truax said he was not aware of any efforts by senators to include the creation of a library fee as a referendum on the spring election ballot. He said he hadn't thought much about it.

During his presentation to the committee, Truax said the committee felt students had supported the construction of the library and that it is the Legislature's job to support its operations.

"This is a state library," Truax said.

Truax said he felt it was important to defend the Privilege Fee Committee's vote.

"Just in my six-year tenure here I've seen a pretty rapid increase in my fees," he said. "It's not that we have anything against the library, but as elected officials we represent the majority of students, and we also represent the minority of students who can't afford it."

Many faculty members on the committee praised student government's efforts to lobby state leaders for more library funding. They suggested it be coordinated on a statewide basis, including students from all Kansas Board of Regents institutions.

Library committee chair Mark Weiss said he didn't think using the library was a privilege.

"This is a state resource," Weiss said. "This library's doors are open to anyone who wants to use it. Sooner or later someone is going to have to pony up—the state does not support this library."

Peter Knupfer, associate professor of history and committee member, said students should resist paying more to support the library than they already do.

Knupfer said a fee "encourages students to believe they should pay for things other people are using. It diminishes the library as a common resource."

Committee discusses options

While discussion will continue on student involvement funding the library, the library itself still has to contend with the demands of its researchers.

Administrators say SGA has earned power given to it

ANGELA KISTNER
Kansas State Collegian

Student Governing Association leaders said in Tuesday's Collegian that administrators have given them a great deal of power at K-State.

But does the administration agree? Where is the power?

Associate Vice President for Institutional Advancement and Dean of Student Life Pat Bosco said SGA has an extraordinary influence.

"I've seen it over three decades now, and the student government here has a rich and strong tradition of influencing the campus environment both in and outside the classroom," he said.

Bosco, a former student body president, said student power at K-State is everywhere—not just within SGA.

"If you look at college councils, if you look at the judicial system set up in residence halls, those are peer judicial boards," Bosco said. "If you look at the accessibility and availability students have to key administrators across campus, students just in general at K-State have a tremendous amount of power."

Assistant Dean of Student Life Jonathan Kulaga said giving students power is part of getting a good education.

"Part of the philosophy of providing students with the greatest education they can get is by not having them in some type of pecking order," he said. "Students can call and have a meeting with Pat Bosco or Bob Krause (vice president for institutional advancement), and that's just one of the things that's nice."

Kulaga said SGA has a lot of power, too.

"All students have power, so when you consolidate into a representative body, that representative body is going to be a very powerful body

ON-THE-JOB TRAINING

Veterinary Medicine students learn by experience

JOHN STOUS
Kansas State Collegian

The Veterinary Services building at Fort Riley smells like any other animal shelter.

K-State veterinary medicine students walk into the building with the knowledge of how to examine small animals and give them checkups before they are adopted. Most have not performed these procedures before.

The students are giving shots and drawing blood from cats and dogs for the first time, and a tense edge fills the room. As soon as the examinations begin, the tension is lifted.

The students flow flawlessly through their assignments. Second-year veterinary students at K-State get their first clinical experiences from the visit to Fort Riley.

The lab is a one-time part of the Clinical Skills course that is a required pass-fail course in the College of Veterinary Medicine. Students travel with their clinical instructor, Kathy Gaughan, to Fort Riley to perform the lab.

"The first three years of vet school are non-clinical years, which means that nearly all their schooling is done in the classroom," Gaughan said. "This is an opportunity for the students to get out and get a feel for what they will be doing if they work on small animals."

The lab is Tuesdays with about seven second-year students, Gaughan, and one or two fourth-year students attending. The program is coordinated by Gaughan; Laine Cowan, associate professor of clinical sciences; and Capt. Phillip Wentz, Branch Chief of Veterinary Services at Fort Riley.

Though the fourth-year students have already gone through the class, Gaughan said they help speed up the time spent at Fort Riley because it allows the group to do two examinations at once.

By splitting up, Gaughan is able to watch one examination while the fourth-year students can supervise the other. Before the students go to Fort Riley, they learn how to do the examinations in the classroom, but Gaughan said this is the first hands-on experience they receive.

Wentz said the program is not set up to help Veterinary Services at Fort Riley, but to help the students in their education.

"This provides the students a chance to practice what they have learned in the classroom," he said.

"It does help our clinic, though, in the respect that more people will be examining our animals before they are adopted."

While some students might work in veterinary hospitals in the summer or have worked at them in the past, Eric Steinlage, a second-year student, said being able to see other practices was an advantage as well.

"I think that it is great to get out and be able to see what different veterinary practices are like," he said. "All practices are set up different, and now we can see what a military practice is like."

The second-year veterinary students also said the physical exams were beneficial for numerous reasons.

Neil Powell, second-year student, said giving the examinations would be beneficial in the future.

"It helps us prepare for our fourth year when we actually get out in clinics on a regular basis," he said. "This way we will have some practical experience and won't just be thrown into practice when the time comes."

Ty Phifer, also a second-year student, said the lab gives the students a chance to remember why they want to be veterinarians.

"The experience is great," he said. "After having spent a year and a half in the classroom, the chance to get out of the classroom is also an opportunity to think about our goals and why we are here."

Sbarro introduces Union Station location with grand opening, promotional contest

Red ribbon crossed the entrance of Union Station on Tuesday morning for the grand opening of Sbarro.

David Griffin, assistant professor of secondary education and president of the Union Corporate Board, had the honor of cutting the ribbon.

"I think it is going to be a very big success. We had the Chamber of Commerce, administration across campus, students and other Union Governing Board people there," Griffin said.

Cindie Snyder, K-State Student Union marketing and promotions manager, said the grand opening wasn't publicized.

"We didn't publicize it, but a large number of Union employees that have followed it from little on were there," she said.

Snyder said Sbarro has done little advertising. "Without doing any advertising, just spread by word of mouth, we had customers the day it opened," she said. "We've actually been open a couple of weeks. This was just to kick it off."

For the grand opening, Sbarro had a drawing for a mountain bike, stereo and a pizza party for 10.

Snyder said Coca-Cola donated the mountain bike and stereo.

To win the prizes, all students had to do was put their name in the drawing, Snyder said.

Alistair Code, Sbarro manager, drew the names of the winners.

Jason Phung, sophomore in business administration, won the stereo. Cindy Augustine, senior in mass communications, won the mountain bike. Eric Shumaker, senior in electrical engineering, won the pizza party for 10.

KSDB-FM 91.9 will have giveaways to students throughout the week from noon to 1 p.m., Snyder said.

"We encourage them to come in and listen to the music. It's just fun to groove to DB92 over the lunch hour," she said. "They will be doing giveaways of pizza and pasta."

Snyder said Sbarro is also having other specials.

"We're having an after-3 p.m. special to let people know it is open until 7 p.m.," she said.

Sbarro has a variety of food choices, Snyder said.

"If you don't like pizza and pasta, they have neat salad choices, also," she said.

Then there is the dessert.

"Word has it that mama Sbarro makes all the cheese-cake by hand," Snyder said.

American Red Cross falls short of goals after 1st 2 days of K-State's blood drive

After two days at K-State, the American Red Cross has collected 146 units of blood.

This semester's blood drive competition with the University of Kansas continues this week in the K-State Student Union from 9:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m., and in Trotter Hall from 10:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Friday only.

The K, S and U rooms in the Union are the sites for the drive. Blood can be given on a walk-in basis.

Nancy Powell, donor resource consultant with the American Red Cross of Wichita, said the drive is still far from reaching the goal of 750 units of blood by the end of the week. By this time Powell said the drive should have collected 200 units.

"The numbers are down," she said. "I know there are tests this week, but this is a competition."

Powell said she hoped a high goal would encourage more participation.

"We beat KU pretty squarely last semester," she said.

Powell said 750 units is a difficult goal to reach, but K-State has always done well in the competition.

CLIF PALMBERG/Collegian

Mann, Macklin announce candidacy

► PRESIDENTIAL HOPEFULS PLAN TO IMPROVE ADVISING, CUT UNNECESSARY COSTS.

KELLEE MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

Tracey Mann and Andy Macklin announced their candidacy for student body president and vice president at the clock south of Hale Library on Tuesday.

If elected, the two said they want to make advising, book purchasing and parking easier for K-State students.

Mann, junior in agricultural economics and political science, and Macklin, junior in mechanical engineering, said announcing their candidacy at the clock signified the time they would dedicate to the student body.

"Now we want to take it further to the future and take K-State to the future," Macklin said.

The running mates said they want to improve the advising system by creating a board of college deans and students that would examine students' advising needs.

The board would also recognize and reward good advisers.

"I have an excellent adviser, and I want others to have the chance to have the same," Mann said.

Another Mann and Macklin platform issue is the creation of a book swap system on the Internet. Students could use the service to buy, sell and trade textbooks with other students, avoiding high bookstore prices, Macklin said.

The third issue would create a parking permit for the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. Students could use the pass to park at the Rec Complex only, saving them the cost of a regular parking permit.

"We have one of the best recreation systems, and through this decrease we could make it better," Mann said. "We want to save the students some money."

Mann said one advantage of his campaign is that he and Macklin have lived in residence halls, off-campus apartments and greek organizations.

"K-State is basically divided by living groups, and we have experienced all three," Mann said.

Mann and Macklin said they hope to see a high voter turnout.

"We would like to see a change from the past record of voting," Macklin said. "If we win or lose we want to know that a lot of people voted."

Macklin said he and Mann are excited about the chance to serve K-State students.

"K-State is an awesome place to go to school, and regardless of the promotion we get nationally, we feel that this is one of the best schools in the nation," Macklin said.

"Not just academically but just for the people, too."

Mann said he has been encouraged by many of his friends to run for the office, and he and Macklin decided in November to run.

"K-State has given a lot to me and to my whole family, and it's amazing to give back," he said.

President contemplates launching military attack on Iraqi weapons arsenal

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton, preparing Americans for possible airstrikes against Iraq, said Tuesday that military force is never the first answer "but sometimes it's the only answer." Unless the international community acts, Saddam Hussein will conclude it "has lost its will," Clinton said.

Cautioning that an attack would not be risk free, the president said, "I know that the people we may call upon in uniform are ready. The American people have to be ready as well."

Clinton used a Pentagon setting and a nationally televised speech to define military goals and a rationale for action.

He said airstrikes would leave Hussein "significantly worse off than he is now." And if one attack does not achieve U.S. goals, "we will be prepared to strike him again," the president said.

Clinton said U.N. inspectors charged with dismantling Hussein's biological, chemical and nuclear weapons have encountered "lies, stonewalling, obstacle after obstacle after obstacle" in the seven years since the Gulf War.

If Hussein is not stopped now, Clinton said, "He will conclude that the international community has lost its will."

"He will then conclude that he can go right on and do more to rebuild an arsenal of devastating destruction."

"And some day, some way, I guarantee you, he'll use the arsenal," the president said. He said Hussein could end this crisis simply by letting the weapons inspectors complete their mission.

Defense Secretary William Cohen said, "Iraq must understand that our patience is not infinite. And at some point we will have to act to reduce the menace posed by Iraq's weapons of mass destruction and to reduce Iraq's ability to threaten its neighbors."

Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz, replying to Clinton, said the United States has no authority to attack. None of Iraq's neighbors wants it to be bombed, Aziz asserted, while countries as far away as New Zealand, Australia and Britain are joining to help the United States.

"It is not a coalition for peace. It is a belligerent coalition to destroy a nation," Aziz said in a CNN interview.

Clinton is expected to continue his public focus on Iraq in coming days, and the White House said he might eventually address the nation from the Oval Office.

Today, Cohen, Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and National Security Adviser Sandy Berger will conduct a public forum in Columbus, Ohio, about the showdown with Iraq.

As the administration made its case to the public, a new poll showed American support for military action weakening. Forty percent of those surveyed said they supported a military strike to resolve the Iraqi standoff, compared with 50 percent two weeks ago, the CNN/USA Today/Gallup poll showed. Yet if Clinton did order airstrikes, 76 percent said they would approve.

In a last-minute diplomatic effort, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan announced Tuesday that he would travel to Baghdad in an effort to resolve the standoff. White House spokesman Mike McCurry said the United States will insist that Annan have clear instructions from the Security Council and an unambiguous message to deliver. Clinton called Annan to review diplomatic efforts with Iraq, a White House official said.

The State Department said U.S. objectives have not changed: unlimited access to more than 60 presidential sites and "dozens and dozens" of others where weapon ingredients might be hidden.

For weeks, Albright and other officials have said diplomacy had virtually run its course.

State Department spokesman James P. Rubin said Tuesday that "the window has not yet shut," although he appeared to be skeptical that Annan's mission would produce a reversal by Hussein.

Clinton underscored the conditions that Hussein must fulfill.

"Iraq must agree — and soon — to free, full, unfettered access" to suspected weapon sites "anywhere in the country," he said.

Clinton was briefed at the Pentagon by Marine Corps Gen. Anthony Zinni, the U.S. commander in the Persian Gulf, and Gen. Henry H. Shelton, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, about military options and the status of U.S. forces.

Library fee must become grass roots movement

Student Senate should have the opportunity to debate the creation of a student fee for Hale Library, in spite of Monday night's decision by Privilege Fee Committee to kill discussion of a proposal.

The committee could have offered an opinion by voting the bill out unfavorably later during the process. A small committee of 11 should not determine the fate of an issue that has hotly divided campus sentiment. The members would not even second a motion so the bill could be sent to Senate and discussed openly.

However, any senator can write and introduce a bill for the creation of a student library fee at the next Senate meeting.

Two college councils have stepped forward to pass resolutions in favor of a student-funded library fee. The Arts and Sciences and Engineering councils are connected to the academic sides of their colleges and should be allowed to have a say.

Acting on the recommendations of the Library Task Force, the administration and dean of libraries have explored and discovered creative funding options.

There has been a lot of rhetoric on both sides of this issue, but what everybody agrees on is the library's need for more money for acquisitions and journals.

Yes, this is a state school and the Kansas Legislature should provide more infrastructure, but it doesn't.

Nobody likes the idea of asking for student money.

Unlike the request from the athletic department for a stadium expansion, student money is not the first option in this case. The library is coming to students after other money has been committed from the Legislature and the KSU Foundation.

K-State's administration has committed $328,000 more per year to fund the library. The Foundation has said it will provide about $300,000 per year. A proposed student fee would be $328,000.

Student money should never compose more than one-third of the library funding and should be contingent on the continued division of revenue sources. In other words, if the Foundation reconsiders its commitment, students should not be made to carry the burden.

The student body has not been asked to fund more than one-third of the money proposed to improve the journal subscriptions and acquisitions.

Also, there should be a sunset clause that requires a three-fourths majority of Senate to renew the fee after five years.

The library funding crisis needs new money, not the constant shifting and reallocation of funds from other areas on campus.

Taking money from one source to fund another will not solve problems in the long run.

This is not an entitlement. It's emergency funding for the center of K-State's academic life that will benefit students directly and the quality of teaching and research for years to come.

If a library fee is passed, control would remain in student hands. The money won't have to come through tuition increases or a lack of funding in another area and will be specifically earmarked to solve library needs.

Our library has the smallest collection and budget in the Big 12 and among peer institutions. But, like the historically poor quality of our football team before Coach Bill Snyder, this situation can be reversed with more money and leadership.

NO MONKEYIN' AROUND

Life's best lessons can be learned in a short trip to Sunset Zoo

From time to time I hear from the occasional passer-by or friend on campus that Manhattan sucks, and there's nothing to do here. Even I have been known to denounce the Little Apple's "fun potential" when I was either a little bored or too lazy to find something to do.

If you're looking to get liquored up or to see the latest blockbuster, there are the local bars and the movie theaters. But if you're just looking for something different to do, my suggestion would be the zoo. Manhattan's Sunset Zoological Park, that is. About a week ago, my girlfriend and I went to the zoo, and the hour and a half we spent there will keep us coming back for years.

Our first stop at the zoo was the new chimpanzee habitat. We arrived at the indoor viewing facility at the same time as a group of mentally challenged individuals. They were obviously on an outing and decided the zoo would be the best place to go. The chimps were just doing what they usually do — playing, swinging and cleaning each other near the viewing glass. To them, it was just another day in the life of some African chimps in a Kansas zoo. To the onlooker, it was a drama, comedy and documentary rolled into one.

The magic first started when the gentleman next to me noticed the mother chimpanzee's breasts. He instantly turned a blazing red and hid his face like a child who had just been embarrassed.

He turned to one of his friends in the group and quietly said, "Look at the boobies," then laughed like he just told a good joke. I let out a little chuckle, showing that I approved of his joke, and then went back to watching the chimps.

I guess my little laugh made him feel more comfortable because the next thing I knew, he was buddy-ing up with me, pointing out every move the chimps made. I stood there with him for almost an hour, fielding observations like, "He eating that carrot!" and, "Look what the babies are doing!" As I stood there with my new friend, I realized how fascinating it all was, not just to him and the rest of the group, but to me as well. Every little thing the chimps did became a monumental event.

I never realized how cool it was to see something as simple as primates eating until I witnessed it with someone special. We stood there and looked for a while longer until it was time for them to go. While the group was filing out the door, my new buddy stopped short, turned and looked at us and then at the chimps. He then shouted, "Bye-bye boobies!" and ran out the door like he had just done something naughty and was fleeing the scene of the crime. I think that was his way of saying, "Take it easy, man."

After viewing the chimps for more than an hour, we decided to hit the big animals before they were put in for the night. It was getting dark, and the air had grown a bit nippy. We headed straight for our second favorite attraction, the tiger. We got there right as a zoo keeper was letting him inside for the evening. He was pacing in front of the gate and growling like he wanted blood.

Then, to our amazement, the keeper simply unlatched the gate and opened herself up to his powerful jaws. It was even more amazing when the tiger brushed up against her legs as he nonchalantly strode into the building. The whole time she just kept saying, "You're a good boy, aren't you?" like she was at home talking to her pet cat.

Dumbfounded by the whole thing, we approached the keeper after she was done. We didn't understand how she could be so calm and collected while interacting with an animal that could kill her in an instant. We thought maybe his life in captivity had broken his will, and that's why he didn't attack. She quickly rebutted our comments and assured us that he was definitely a man-eater. She explained to us that the only reason he doesn't eat her is because she is the one who feeds him. He knows that he relies on her for food, so a certain amount of respect has been established between them. Anyone else in her position would have been tiger food.

We stood there for a while with her, listening to stories about the tiger and other animals in the zoo.

It was her willingness to shoot the breeze with two people she had never met before that made the whole zoo experience much more personal.

My girlfriend and I were very pleased with our choice to come to the zoo that day. As we drove away, I thought about all the cool things I saw and great things I learned at the animal haven on the hill. I acquired priceless knowledge in animal behavior, human interaction and life, all from 90 minutes at Sunset Zoo.

So next time bowling doesn't sound fun and the bars' call isn't as strong, take some time out to enlighten yourself.

Take some time out for the zoo.

Improvement opportunities abound after fire

Once a thriving section of Aggieville, the 1915 Harrison building is no more as of Saturday morning.

A club for live music and dancing for generations of K-State students, an Aggieville landmark has suddenly been wiped from the fabric of our city. It's always sad when a historic building succumbs to a disaster, but out of the smoldering bricks and aged wood of the ruin, several redevelopment opportunities arise.

With any large fire, there's always the chance for renewal — a chance even to change the very nature of Aggieville. That's been the case in cities such as Chicago, Dresden and London, all cities that have suffered heavily from Lucifer's torch.

However, each city has rebuilt itself to become great once again. After the great London fire of 1666, the architect Christopher Wren was charged with building more than 50 new churches, which still leave an indelible mark on the city's culture.

After the Great Chicago Fire of 1871, the city boomed into the 20th century with modern skyscrapers and trend-setting architecture.

Dresden, Germany, is rebuilding the famed Frauenkirche, destroyed in World War II, using computers to detail where every shred of stone left from its destruction will be placed.

While these three cities might be, to put it bluntly, way out of Aggieville's league, the basic point remains that new design opportunities must be considered with caution and with the future in sight.

VIEWPOINT

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Russell is a fifth-year senior in architectural engineering. You can send e-mail to Russell at rmf@ksu.edu.

Any developer can throw up a metal shed, like they're doing on Fort Riley/Tuttle Creek Boulevard, but no one clamors to Manhattan to see metal sheds. For some reason, Aggieville has managed to stave off the low-grade, throwaway development of the other commercial districts in Manhattan.

But where do we go from here? Rebuild the old? Introduce something new? Let the developers work it out on their own?

Some things are already clear. What Aggieville does not need is a shoddy reconstruction of the old, destroyed buildings or a new project that would annihilate the streetscape. A mini-mall, parking lot, pedestrian park or fast food restaurant should be immediately stricken from all developers' thoughts.

Any new building should respect the streetscape, meaning setbacks should conform to the existing conditions. This was laid out in 1982 with the Aggieville Improvement Plan, commissioned by the Aggieville Business Association.

That plan is largely responsible for the way modern Aggieville looks: distinctive sign and lighting elements, brick pavement, landmark entranceways and the reinforcement of existing densities. Although this plan might be largely forgotten, it remains an important resource for any new development that could change Aggieville forever.

For the most part, Aggieville is a series of outside urban rooms that give one a sense of security and place. Visitors can walk down Moro Street and peer into shops and clubs and see activity.

The classic example of how this condition can be eroded is the Hardee's development on North Manhattan Avenue. Hardee's is set back more than 30 feet, completely unaware of its neighbors. Had this building been placed right on the street, in line with the Espresso Royale Cafe, a continuous street pattern would have been reinforced and Aggieville could have maintained its character for another block.

Even newer developments, like Java Espresso and Bakery, go only so far in enhancing and building Aggieville's image. Yes, the building does uphold the streetscape, but it's a one-use building. What would have completed the picture is a second story with apartments, or perhaps another commercial outlet.

Second-story apartments can only help Aggieville in that they provide customers and they turn what could be a bland commercial district into a working neighborhood. With good apartments close to campus becoming scarce and with traffic and parking nightmares around K-State, who wouldn't dream of living within walking distance to school, bookstores, coffee shops and restaurants? Days, even weeks, might go by before you would need to use your car. Imagine that.

Whoever develops this important piece of real estate needs to think of the long-term benefits to Aggieville, because it's likely whatever is built out of these ashes will stand for another 80 years. If a two-story club is not to be built, then second-story apartments would be most welcome to this part of Aggieville.

The introduction of unconventional architecture is another option. Aggieville has a small-town Kansas aura, but lacks any worthy example of local architecture. Perhaps the city's architects and intelligentsia could pull together and offer conceptual suggestions about future development. For Aggieville is not to be taken lightly, but to be shared by the community that cherishes it so.

Collegian headline infers race inequality

Editor,

I am writing to comment on the very misleading headline used in the Feb. 16 Collegian. According to the headline "Rules might exclude minorities; admission requirements may keep black students from attending college," it is possible for the reader to infer that minority students are somehow being targeted in the name of raising standards. Additionally, stating that only 97 of the 144 black students who entered K-State this fall would have been admitted under the new standards, while failing to state the statistics for non-minorities, leaves the reader with the impression once again that only minorities will be affected by the changes.

This type of bias in a newspaper of your quality should not be acceptable. The fact of the matter is that higher standards of admission will disqualify all students failing to meet the requirements, regardless of their race. This is not by any means a bad thing. Not everyone is capable of college-level course work; therefore, they should not be allowed into a college until they are prepared. Is this elitist? Maybe. Will it increase the overall level of the education that qualified students receive? Most likely. Is it the quality of the students that matters, or the quantity?

I agree that the quality of education received in various high schools is not equal, and this problem most definitely must be addressed. But I also think that having low, or in our case, no entrance standards does nothing to fix the problem. Let's attempt to bring the standards of our high schools up a few levels, as opposed to dropping the standards of our universities and colleges.

That is the real issue, and it is by no means an issue of black vs. white.

Davis, Boomer announce candidacy

KELLEE MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

With the goal of giving power back to students, Greg Davis and Jim Boomer announced their candidacy for student body president and vice president Tuesday outside the K-State Student Union.

Davis, senior in informational systems and marketing, and Boomer, senior in management information systems and accounting, said their main goal is to unite student life and student government.

"We want to bring the student voice back and bring the power back to the students," Davis said.

Davis said one of the main reasons he decided to run for office was to improve the communication link between Student Governing Association and the student body. Too often, student government decides what issues should be important and then force them on the general student population, he said.

"Student life sometimes suffers because they are given issues, but what we are trying to get is student-derived issues," Davis said.

Boomer said communication with students will encourage them to become more involved in the system.

"That will drive more of the student body — if they are more informed on the major issues," he said. "They will feel more of a motivation to get involved in more of the leadership positions on campus, and leadership can then be spread out among the university, rather than just a core group."

Both candidates said they hope to represent students instead of their own personal interests. Their motto is, "For the right reasons."

Davis and Boomer proposed five new student committees as part of their administration. They would focus on community service, new-student orientation, campus safety and other issues.

Boomer said the new committees are a small part of the Davis/Boomer ticket's fresh-face approach.

"We want to emphasize that we bring a fresh face to student government. We have new ideas to get the whole university involved from community service to extracurricular activities," he said. "We've come up with some great ideas on getting the student body involved within their colleges and within the university as a whole."

Davis said the campaign is a genuine effort to make K-State better for students.

"We are doing this for true reasons. We are two individuals who have the time and commitment level to carry out the duties. We are doing this to make improvements while we are here," Davis said.

The campaign has established an Internet site that should be in operation by Friday. The address is www-personal.ksu.edu/~gsdavis.

GREG DAVIS, SENIOR IN INFORMATION SYSTEMS AND MARKETING, AND JIM BOOMER, SENIOR IN MANAGEMENT INFORMATION SYSTEMS AND ACCOUNTING, ANNOUNCED THEIR CANDIDACY FOR THE STUDENT BODY PRESIDENTIAL TICKET TUESDAY AFTERNOON. DAVIS, RIGHT, IS RUNNING FOR PRESIDENT, AND BOOMER, LEFT, IS RUNNING FOR VICE PRESIDENT.

Decade of enrollment growth creates structural, financial changes for K-State

AMY BICKEL
Kansas State Collegian

Ten years ago, students at K-State didn't readily access e-mail.

There was no winning football team, students used the library more than the Internet and tuition for a full-time undergraduate student was $535.

A lot has changed for K-State in the past 10 years, and it's still changing.

There are 3,429 more students on campus since 1987, totaling 20,306.

Numbers are just one change to the university.

"A lot of things have happened at K-State, a great deal has been accomplished and a lot of new buildings — the library, biochemistry building, museums," said Peter Nicholls, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

Nicholls said he thought one of the most prominent areas of the university has been its teaching methods, such as advising.

"Look at the number of students winning scholarships. It has been running high the last 10 years," he said. "The administration has been very sensitive to advising issues. Students can get help in this area."

Also, Nicholls said awareness of multicultural issues has increased. Since 1987, multicultural students have increased by 1,141, totaling 2,404.

"Events such as Martin Luther King celebrations are now big universitywide events and involve just about everyone on campus in one form or another," Nicholls said. "In 1991, there wasn't a single African-American tenured faculty member in the College of Arts and Sciences. Now there are probably seven or eight."

Tim Donoghue, vice provost of research and dean of the Graduate School, said he has been trying to attract more minority students to K-State.

He created the Summer Undergraduate Research Opportunities Program that brings minority undergraduates to campus in the summer and involves them in research programs with the expectation that many of the students will enroll for graduate study at K-State when they complete their undergraduate degrees.

"Manhattan is always a surprising place, many students don't know about it, especially if you live outside of K-State. We try to attract them here," Donoghue said.

He said one of the best changes in past years was in research. More money and newer equipment has been added for faculty members' and graduate students' use.

Since 1987, research grants have increased $31 million.

"You get to see what the faculty can do and see their ability and enthusiasm because they are doing things they haven't had the capability to do before," Donoghue said.

Other colleges on campus are seeing changes also. David Mugler, director of Academic Programs for the College of Agriculture, said the number of nontraditional students and women is increasing for agriculture majors.

For the whole campus, there are 3,925 nontraditional students, an increase of 535 students from 1987, and 9,639 women on campus, an increase of 1,551.

"We are at an all-time high of 36-percent increase of women in agriculture — up from 33 percent last year," Mugler said. "Women have increased in other colleges as well. When my wife and I met at K-State, only one woman was in the College of Veterinary Medicine — my wife's roommate. Now 65 out of the 100 students accepted for this year's vet school class are women."

Mugler also said the College of Agriculture has had an increase in enrollment by 45 percent in the past 10 years.

Nicholls said K-State is constantly changing, but one aspect that has remained the same is the attitudes of administrators, faculty and students.

"Attitude makes K-State a better place to work," Nicholls said. "Students are getting involved in Telefunds, trying to raise money for their college, basically for nothing. It's that kind of attitude people pick up on when visiting K-State. That attitude has continued to increase and make this a good place to be."

BIG 12 FOOTBALL

1998 Kickoff Classic set: Florida State, Texas A&M to battle in San Francisco

NEW YORK — Florida State just made its annual run for the national title a bit tougher: The Seminoles will play Texas A&M in the Kickoff Classic to open the 1998 season.

The game is set for Aug. 31, at Giants Stadium.

Florida State, which finished No. 3 last season after a 31-14 win over Ohio State in the Sugar Bowl, has rarely taken the easy road with its non-conference schedule.

In addition to their Atlantic Coast Conference foes, which includes North Carolina, the Seminoles also play Florida, Miami and Southern California this season.

"It will be a very difficult game for us especially as a season opener with new starters at some key positions," Florida State coach Bobby Bowden said Tuesday when the matchup was announced. "But I think it's good for college football for teams to take on challenges."

For the Aggies, who finished No. 20 after a 29-23 loss to UCLA in the Cotton Bowl, the matchup was somewhat surprising because Texas A&M of the Big 12 usually takes the easier non-conference option. This season, Texas A&M's other non-conference foes are Louisiana Tech, North Texas and Southern Mississippi.

"We're excited about opening the 1998 season in New York against a quality program like Florida State," Texas A&M athletic director Wally Groff said. "We're honored we were selected."

Both teams have visited Giants Stadium before — the Aggies lost 23-14 to Nebraska in the '87 Kickoff Classic and the Seminoles beat Kansas 42-0 in the '93 game. After the win, Florida State went on to win its first national championship.

Florida Marlins make Presidential visit

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Finally arriving at a place that understands cutbacks, the Florida Marlins showed up at the White House on Tuesday missing 10 of their World Series heroes.

"They're all working on the '98 budget cuts," Bobby Bonilla told President Clinton, who burst into laughter.

Nineteen Marlins greeted the president in the East Room of the White House after an off-season of payroll purges. Twelve of the 25 players who beat Cleveland last October are no longer with the team, and just two of the former players — Jeff Conine and Tony Saunders — showed up Tuesday.

"There's no use going to Washington," said pitcher Robb Nen, who spent the day at Scottsdale, Ariz., practicing with his new team, San Francisco.

"It's not worth it to meet the president," Nen said. "If I was still with those guys, maybe. But now, I'm dedicated to this team. My goal now is to get ready for March 31."

Florida has cut its payroll in half this season, to about $27 million, and even manager Jim Leyland acknowledges the Marlins have little chance of repeating.

"It may not be the precise same Marlin team that played the Indians last year that takes the field on opening day," Clinton said. "But if the players keep the same spirit, they'll be sure to be in the hunt again when the season comes to a close."

Harry Caray's prognosis called poor

RANCHO MIRAGE, Calif. — Longtime Chicago Cubs broadcaster Harry Caray remained unconscious and in critical condition Tuesday, and a spokesman said the family is hoping for another miracle.

"Things do not look good," Bill Wills said. "However, in Harry's past, there have been many times when things did not look good for recovery, and he's beaten them every time."

Tests taken at Eisenhower Medical Center, where the 78-year-old Caray was taken after a fall at a night club Saturday night, revealed that the prognosis for functional recovery is poor, Wills said, quoting doctors.

"The medical terminology for this is hypoxic ischemic encephalopathy — doctors call it HIE," Wills said. "Harry's condition continues as critical, his body signs continue to be stable."

Caray collapsed Saturday night after his heart suddenly changed rhythm, which seriously affected his circulation and the supply of oxygen to his brain.

The Hall of Fame broadcaster has been unconscious and breathing with the help of a ventilator since being admitted to the hospital, Wills said.

Cats looking for opportunities on field today

JEREMY KELLEY
Kansas State Collegian

K-State baseball coach Mike Clark is hoping for some good weather at 1 p.m. today when his team faces the Doane College Tigers at Frank Myers Field.

For the past few weeks, rain has deterred the Cats from stepping on the diamond and getting the on-field practice time they need.

"It's been extremely tough on the kids because we haven't been able to practice outside," Clark said. "Compare it to when you're able to play street ball and shoot, but not have any defense on you in the basketball game and all of the sudden you have to go out and play in a coliseum, and it's a totally different environment."

Last weekend, K-State split an opening double-header with Air Force. The Cats won the first game 11-5, via a six-run sixth inning, and dropped the second game of the double-header 15-5. K-State lost the final game on Sunday 5-4.

"We didn't do a very good job with runners on base in the last two ball games, and that's a concern," he said. "But yet again, it's awfully tough when you're not able to practice against live pitching."

Clark said that's a significant problem. The Cats have played six games this year and have been out on the playing field for just five days. Other than its games, K-State hasn't seen any other action on the field.

"It's certainly disappointing," he said. "We need to get into a repetition where we can get outside on a regular basis. It's impossible to get into game rhythm with our practice routine the way it is right now."

Even though the sun isn't shining, there are some bright spots early in the season. As a team, K-State is batting .316 in its first six games, this mark coming with almost every position player on the roster getting swings at the plate.

"Our average as a team is up there, and that's a positive thing," Clark said.

Right fielder Andy Silva has one of the hottest bats on the team thus far. In six games, Silva is 11-for-22, with an on-base percentage of .633, the highest of the team. Silva hit .400 last week and went six-for-nine in the double-header at Air Force.

"I had a lot of fun there," Silva said. "It was a great hitting park."

As a team, K-State has recorded 67 hits in its first six games, with 23 of those hits going for extra bases. Clark said the team was concentrating more on base hits this year and less on the home run.

"What we're hoping for is more doubles this year, and our on-base percentage is what we're looking at more than anything," he said. "We won't have as many home runs as we did last year because we don't have the maturity and the strength that we did last year."

CYCLONE ATTACK

Cats look to improve road record, chances for NCAA Tournament

SUN DEE MILLS
Kansas State Collegian

Not many good things have happened to Iowa State (11-14 overall, 4-8 in the conference) since the K-State men's basketball team defeated the Cyclones 77-59 in Bramlage Coliseum on Jan. 14.

The Cyclones returned home to beat Texas, Colorado and Texas A&M — which hasn't won a conference game — while losing six other games.

Those three wins, however, are the only ones Iowa State has seen since the K-State trip. The key word in the previous paragraph is home.

Since Jan. 14, the Cats have captured four wins, one being a road win at Nebraska. Going up to Ames, Iowa, tonight puts the Cats back on the road in a crucial situation against the No. 11 team in the Big 12. To gain an NCAA Tournament appearance, the Cats have to come home with a win.

"We could win three or four of our games and still not get in," K-State coach Tom Asbury said. "Every game is a must-win now."

The road win at Nebraska is still fresh enough in his players' minds for them to recreate the feeling, Asbury said. But beating a team twice is always tough.

"Iowa State is playing with more confidence, definitely," he said. "But they're also at home. They're getting better. They're not all that young, but they're playing with a new bunch of guys."

Against Colorado on Saturday, the Cyclones forced the Buffaloes into foul trouble — two starters ended with four and Buff forward Charlie Melvin fouled out. On the charity stripe, Cyclone forwards Marcus Fizer and Stevie Johnson converted 15 of 20 free throws to become two of the team's three double-digit scorers.

Cyclone forward Paul Shirley, originally from Meriden, Kan., came off the bench to hit four-of-six field goals and a perfect five-of-five free throws to be the third Iowa State player to score at least 10.

"Shirley's a smart kid," Asbury said. "He's figured out that this is a good opportunity for him. He did some legitimate things against us — that wasn't a fluke."

In front of a sizable fan club in Bramlage, Shirley led the Cyclones in scoring with 19 points and pulled down seven rebounds.

A reversal of sorts is in store for Cat guard Aaron Swartzendruber — Ames is about 2 1/2 hours from his hometown of Kalona, Iowa, and his family has seen him play there every year.

"I'm sure he'd love to have a great game up there," Asbury said. "But we don't want to talk much about it — why put pressure on the guy?"

Last season's game in Ames wasn't one of Swartzendruber's best — he only sank one of eight field goal attempts and missed both three-pointers he shot.

But back in his familiar shooting guard position, Swartzendruber's season this year has gone much better — he is sixth in the Big 12 in three-point percentage with .400 and 10th in steals, averaging 1.7 per game. He said he's taking a wait-and-see attitude for the rest of the season.

"At this point, we just have to concentrate on each and every game, one game at a time," he said.

K-State, Patterson expect long-range game with Cyclones

SUN DEE MILLS
Kansas State Collegian

The Iowa State Cyclones bring a battle to the floor in Bramlage Coliseum tonight that will take place outside.

Outside the perimeter, that is.

"They're a tremendous threat," K-State coach Deb Patterson said. "They don't go deep, but they've usually got five players on the floor that can shoot the three."

With a 9-3 conference record, Iowa State, one of four Big 12 teams that is perfect at home, is positioning itself for its second appearance in the NCAA Tournament in as many years. It would also be only the second postseason appearance in school history.

The Cyclones run a nontraditional offense, allowing post players Jayme Olson and Janel Grimm to pop out and put up outside shots. The team had its highest three-point percentage when it knocked off No. 4 Texas Tech on Jan. 20, converting on 14-of-24 attempts.

"Their post players are not traditional posts," Patterson said. "Olson and Grimm can put it on the floor."

Iowa State suffered its third conference loss at Kansas on Saturday. Neither Grimm nor Olson sank a three-pointer, and the team shot only 28 percent from the perimeter.

"They live by the three," Patterson said. "The other night when they lost, they weren't shooting the three well."

The Wildcats aren't allowing their opponents many good looks from the outside — the Cats' defense is keeping opponents to a .316 three-point percentage. But if the Cyclones are hitting on all cylinders, Patterson said she fears it could be a key factor in the game.

"Defensively, they can get you standing still. We're going to have to play some man defense," she said. "We've got to cut down on their three-point looks. We've also got to do a better job of moving on the pass."

Iowa State's passing attack moves the ball down the court quickly without the players putting it on the floor much. Freshman point guard Kim Woodlee remembers the Jan. 28 loss at Ames, Iowa, as a game of raining three-pointers.

"We've definitely got to defend the three," Woodlee said. "If they make threes against us, it'll be over. They just fire them away, probably the most that I've seen in the Big 12."

Woodlee has a little experience with perimeter shooting as well. Her 45-percent average leads the Big 12. But since the Kansas game Feb. 7, she said she hasn't been shooting well. Opponents have figured out her potency from the perimeter.

"Shooting the ball's not my No. 1 priority," Woodlee said. "If I have a chance, I'll put it up, but I don't get a whole lot of wide-open looks any more."

In the 64-46 loss in Ames, Patterson said her team got good looks at the basket, but the shots just didn't drop. Making sure Iowa State has the same problem offensively will be the Cats' goal.

Patterson also said she saw a similarity to a previous non-conference opponent, Utah, in some respects.

"Utah did a good job of establishing an inside game in the second half, though," she said. "I'm hoping Iowa State doesn't have that in their arsenal."

All these factors have Patterson and her players anticipating a tough game. Iowa State's unconventional play causes matchup problems, making the game what she called a great challenge.

"They're just not a traditional team," she said. "That's why they're second in this league."

Warning: This is not a performance-enhancing column by any means

Just say Nagano!

Nations in search of icons need to look no further than the Olympic Games.

From Katarina Witt to Carl Lewis, from Alberto Tomba to Nadia Comaneci, from the 1980 U.S. hockey team to the 1992 Jamaican bobsledders, the Olympics have been a veritable who's who of heroes.

Enter 1998, the year of a new breed of hero — Ross "The Rebel" Rebagliati. Rebagliati is the Canadian snowboarder dude known less for winning a gold medal in the men's giant slalom than for losing it after he tested positive for marijuana, only to regain the medal after successfully challenging the International Olympic Committee's ambiguous policy on pot.

Somewhere, Jesse Owens is shaking his head. Somewhere else, Bob and Doug McKenzie are celebrating.

Last Wednesday, the IOC stripped Rebagliati of his gold medal after a urinalysis turned up 1.78 nanograms of marijuana in his system. Rebagliati vehemently denied having smoked pot — well, at least since April (which still doesn't explain why he was seen eating 27 Big Macs and 32 super-sized orders of fries after his gold-medal run).

He attributed the results of the drug test to a going-away party he attended before the Olympics, during which he likely inhaled some second-hand dope smoke.

On Thursday, the Court for Arbitration of Sport unanimously reversed the IOC's decision to strip Rebagliati of his medal. It acknowledged marijuana as a social drug not specifically prohibited by Olympic rules, thus placing it in a different category than performance-enhancing drugs.

After the reversal, some members of Rebagliati's rabid legion of supporters went so far as to suggest he should have received not one but two medals for the impressive feat of getting smoked out and still managing to win a high-intensity Olympic event.

While only mildly embarrassing to Rebagliati, the controversy provided free publicity for a sport struggling to get noticed. Moreover, it begged the question: What exactly did the IOC expect when it begrudgingly placed among its medal events a sport previously worthy only of Mountain Dew commercials?

In hindsight, Rebagliati's gaffe gave only a small taste of what Olympic snowboarders had to offer. At a press conference designed to introduce the U.S. team, 18-year-old Ross Powers couldn't open his mouth for three seconds without unleashing at least one profanity. Powers eventually won a bronze medal in — yes, it's the real name of an event — the men's half-pipe.

In a later incident, Austrian snowboarder Martin Freinademetz was booted from his hotel after destroying $4,000 worth of property during a late-night party.

The Olympics — especially the Winter Games — are starved for young viewers. No longer do ice dancing or long-distance speed skating capture the short attention spans of today's youths. Like it or not, snowboarding is Olympic Ritalin. It's a popular sport on the rise. Rebagliati just made the sport even more popular, and in the process he replaced Kurt Cobain on the throne of teenage martyrdom.

So what's wrong with an Olympic athlete inhaling a little pot, second-hand or otherwise? Apparently nothing, according to the rules. It certainly can't give an athlete an unfair advantage, which is why the IOC merely discourages its use, instead of forbidding it.

In the end, the IOC seemed more disturbed that, for one brief moment, the Olympics offered little more than, say, Woodstock '94.

Perhaps the IOC should be grateful Rebagliati left his mark in the Winter Games and not the Summer Games. Who knows what havoc would be wreaked if they put "The Rebel" in the same hotel as the Dream Team?

LEGOS GO MEDIEVAL

Area elementary school children learn architectural elements with toys

Architecture students lowered the drawbridge Tuesday, inviting area elementary school students to a kind of Lego party in Seaton Hall.

Third-grade students from Clyde and Clifton elementary schools swarmed Seaton's open review area Tuesday morning, clamoring for space close to the large pile of Legos dumped on the floor. The object: to construct a castle.

The students visited K-State as part of the American Institute of Architects Student chapter's outreach program. The K-State AIAS chapter sponsored a similar day last year.

Before getting down to business, the students sat in on what is perhaps their first architectural history slide course. Associate Professor of Architecture Mick Charney spoke to the captivated bunch of students for 15 minutes.

Charney reviewed everything from Asian examples of castles to German, French and English examples, as well as the contemporary kitsch of Disneyland and shopping malls. Along the way, he introduced terms such as battlements, machicolations and even a Japanese term that drew laughs.

During the lecture, students interrupted with questions and answers for Charney, who later said he was surprised the students knew so much about a castle's architectural elements.

Shane Hoesli, a student from Clyde Elementary, said he would love to live in a castle someday, mainly because they are so big.

"They look cool," Hoesli said, referring to Japanese castles. "I knew about them because I saw them on the Internet at home."

Ashley Moore, a student from Clifton Elementary, said she also wouldn't mind living in a castle.

"Because you'd be more protected from your enemies," Moore said. Asked if she had many enemies, Moore said, "Yeah, probably."

Marcia Knoetgen, a teacher from Clifton, said the activity builds on research and studies the class has worked on the past few weeks in school.

"Students are always interested in doing things with their hands," Knoetgen said. "The team effort is something that is very important."

The K-State students took the Legos to Eugene Field Elementary later Tuesday afternoon for the same function. The K-State AIAS borrowed the buckets of Legos from the AIAS chapter of the University of Nebraska-Lincoln, although organizers said they are working to get a set exclusive to K-State.

"The idea of it is to reach out to the students of the community," said Kimberly Murphy, fifth-year senior in architecture. "The theme running through this whole year is building community."

Murphy said the event is also a chance for students to learn more about architecture.

"I think something that happens in grade schools is learning about doctors or sometimes artists, but it's very rare they learn about architects," Murphy said. "Even though these students may not become architects, they can have an appreciation for the role of the architect in the community."

"I think every kid has a little builder inside."

Scholarship scams prevalent in spring

SARA ZENGER

Students should be on the lookout for scholarship scams, said the director of the Office of Student Financial Assistance.

"I do not believe students should be paying large amounts of money to search for scholarships," Larry Moeder said. "But I do think they should be doing some kind of scholarship search. There's lots of money out there."

Scholarship scams are prevalent in the spring when people are considering their options for the next academic year. Mary Horsch, director of communications for the State of Kansas Office of the Attorney General, said these scams often focus on parents with college-age children.

"They say they have all these scholarships available. Once you send in the fee, they send you a long list of scholarships that apply to different backgrounds that aren't necessarily available to the person applying," Horsch said.

These scholarship companies often send letters or postcards to parents and students. When they call for information, they are told for a fee, usually between $100 and $300, the company will send information about scholarships that match the student's interests. Because the company often guarantees results or your money back, many parents and students buy into the scam.

But Horsch said paying for someone else to do your scholarship search is unnecessary.

"You're really paying for something you don't need to pay for," Horsch said. Moeder said he recommends students invest their time in free scholarship searches.

"Going to the library and researching companies and organizations that may have scholarships is a help to students doing their own free scholarship searches," Moeder said.

Moeder also suggests fastWeb, a free online scholarship search resource at www.fastweb.com.

Beth Powers, College of Arts and Sciences academic adviser, recently updated another source for scholarship information on campus. "A Selected List of Scholarships, Grants, Fellowships, Internships and Prizes" was first compiled by a faculty member about 20 years ago. Powers revised it last spring and said it is a complete resource for students looking for scholarships.

"It ranges from scholarships that include anybody to very specific ones that aren't commonly heard of," Powers said.

This book is on reserve at Hale Library or can be bought from the College of Arts and Sciences Copy Center in Eisenhower Hall.

Powers said she also recommends checking with your academic department for scholarship information.

"Sometimes they know about little things here and there that others wouldn't know about," Powers said.

There is hope for the parent or student who gets caught in a scholarship scam before trying these free resources.

"We certainly invite anyone to call our office. We'll send them a complaint form, ask for information, and then contact the company and try to recover their money," Horsch said.

INVISIBLE MINORITY

Speaker identifies constitutional arguments commonly used to uphold rights of gays, lesbians in court cases

STORY BY JENNIFER LUCKE • PHOTO BY CLIF PALMBERG

Gay rights are a First Amendment issue, Paul Siegel, gay rights activist, said Tuesday during his speech "Lavender Correctness: Why We Should Not Try to Silence the Homophobes."

Siegel said there are four distinct constitutional arguments used for gay and lesbian rights cases in the U.S. Supreme Court. Only one is successful, he said.

The argument used in gay and lesbian rights cases that most often wins says discrimination against homosexuals is a violation of the First Amendment.

"When you are able to articulate a plausible freedom of speech First Amendment argument in a gay rights case, you are likely to win," Siegel said.

Another argument says discrimination against homosexuals is cruel and unusual punishment, Siegel said. The logic is that a gay or lesbian person might be fired or in other ways discriminated against, but a jail sentence of 25 years to life is cruel and unusual punishment.

Siegel said gays and lesbians have argued their right to privacy in front of the Supreme Court. He said this argument is unsuccessful. The word privacy does not appear anywhere in the U.S. Constitution, although it has been inferred.

Precedents have been set allowing privacy to cover the right to abortion, but not private consensual sexual behavior, Siegel said.

The final argument says equal protection under the law should protect gay rights.

Siegel said gays and lesbians cannot win a court case using this argument because they are not a suspect class. He said being a member of a suspect class, such as certain racial groups, means the court is likely to say rights are being infringed upon.

Gays and lesbians also suffer from prejudice, Siegel said.

WE ARE ONLY LIKELY TO ENCOUNTER PREJUDICE, OPPRESSION IF WE COME OUT, PAUL SIEGEL
gay rights activist

Siegel quoted David Richards of New York University Law School. Richards compared gays and lesbians to the first advocates of Planned Parenthood or evolutionism. Richards said homosexuals are seen as heretics.

Siegel said gays and lesbians consider themselves the invisible minority in that they are not as easy to pick out as other minorities.

"We are only likely to encounter prejudice, oppression if we come out," Siegel said.

Most states have laws allowing employers to fire employees for being gay, Siegel said. He continued to say many employee manuals are changing.

"Traditionally accepted arguments against gay rights no longer cut it with educated people," he said.

Siegel said one of those traditional arguments is that homosexual activity is not natural. He said that is not a reason homosexuality is wrong beyond a statement about what a person was raised to believe.

Siegel addressed the issue of homophobia. He said non-effeminate gay males elicit more homophobia than effeminate gay males.

Very effeminate gay men are perceived as having no choice in the matter, he said. Siegel said the non-effeminate gay male is seen as someone who had it all and gave it all up.

The Bisexual and Gay and Lesbian Society co-sponsored Siegel's lecture with the Union Program Council Multicultural Committee.

Former midshipman convicted for murdering boyfriend's 1-time lover

ASSOCIATED PRESS

FORT WORTH, Texas — A jury convicted former Naval Academy midshipman Diane Zamora on Tuesday of killing a 16-year-old romantic rival, rejecting her defense that an abusive boyfriend manipulated her into a confession.

The jury deliberated for six hours Monday, then needed only minutes Tuesday morning to convict Zamora, 20, of the Dec. 4, 1995, slaying of Adrienne Jones.

Jurors rejected lesser charges of kidnapping, assault and false imprisonment.

Showing no emotion as the verdict was read, Zamora automatically received a life sentence because prosecutors were not seeking the death penalty.

She will be eligible for parole after 40 years.

During the two-week trial, Zamora tearfully told the jury that she confessed to helping her boyfriend kill his one-time lover under duress. She said she had merely memorized and repeated the same statement given by then-fiance David Graham, a former Air Force Academy cadet.

The couple were high school seniors at the time of the killing. Both graduated with honors and earned prestigious spots in military academies the next year, she at the Naval Academy, he at the Air Force Academy. They were arrested in September 1996 after Zamora's academy roommates reported she had admitted to a killing.

Jones' relatives addressed the court after the verdict. Many in the courtroom dabbed their eyes as they spoke, but Zamora remained stone-faced.

"We all loved and enjoyed Adrienne very much," said the girl's father, Bill Jones, speaking slowly while fighting his emotions.

"We all looked forward to a life with her. ... We will never know what heights she would have (risen) to because of this animal act. And we shall have to wonder the rest of our lives."

Zamora's family appeared solemn as state Judge Joe Drago read the verdict. When he read the sentence, one of her relatives gasped "Oh, God!" and several others cried, clutching each other. One relative collapsed in the crowded courtroom while the family members prayed in a circle with their pastor.

Lead prosecutor Mike Parrish said he was stunned by Zamora's lack of emotion.

"As she once said about Adrienne, 'She deserved it. She deserved what she got,'" Parrish said.

In his dreadlocks and wire-rimmed glasses, Byron defies bland swing-era stereotypes before he even plays a note. His musical interests range from Stravinsky to Motown.

In addition to the first musical set, Byron and his friends will perform a remarkable score he created to Scar of Shame. This 1920s silent classic once labeled a "race movie", focuses on the life of urban blacks in the 1920s.

"Byron plays with almost alarming command. If he carries anything from his klezmer work, it is his ability to make the clarinet cry, laugh, lecture and mourn as if it were human..."

'Art about Art' displays renderers' work

TODD PACEY
Kansas State Collegian

They say life imitates art or art imitates life, but what about art imitating art? This is the idea behind the exhibit "Art about Art" presented by the Department of Interior Design and the College of Human Ecology in the Union Art Gallery through Sunday.

Historically, buildings have been more than places of residence, work or recreation. Like clothes, buildings do more than serve a purpose. They make a statement. They have to set their building apart from others.

The people who are funding the construction or the reconstruction of something want to know on what they will spend their money. Enter the renderer. The job of a renderer is to make the project look real and appealing.

"A professional renderer takes the project from the level of a technical drawing to, in the best examples, the level of art," said Mary Stone Lamb, assistant professor of clothing textiles and interior design and co-curator of the exhibit.

Lamb said there are two types of renderers: an in-house renderer and a professional renderer. She said the work of an in-house renderer is less formal and is done to show the client what a project will look like. The professional renderer's work is of something that does not exist yet and needs financial backing.

The exhibit features work normally not made available to the public. Some renderings are occasionally shown to the public, but the process is not. The exhibit features works that show the different stages of a project.

Lamb said Frank M. Costantino, one of the renderers featured in the exhibit, was helpful. She said he recommended people to her because there are many renderers whose great work goes unrecognized by the public.

"This is the first time that I have done something like this. There has been a really big response. I'd like to make it an annual event, maybe involve a student competition. It is important that they understand the amount of time that goes into these drawings," Lamb said.

The exhibit features works from technical drawings to the finished product. It features work done by Costantino, Robert Becker, Elizabeth Day, Dick Sney and Susan Lynn, among others.

Internet cafe to open

DIANA LEE
Kansas State Collegian

The inexperienced computer user as well as the pro can surf the Internet at the Internet Cafe from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. today in Union Station.

"Apple Computers is sending a number of people to come in and help by answering questions," said Chris Loehr, computer buyer at the K-State Union Bookstore. "Pat Beedles, the K-State Apple representative, has tried to provide links that appeal to almost everyone. There are K-State things and other fun stuff from outside of the K-State environment."

Those interested in visiting some cool sites will select from links set up on a home page in a format similar to a cafe menu.

Entrees on the menu provide a link to the K-State home page, which takes the user through different aspects of campus life and events.

"Under the dessert menu, there are links to such sites as Jerry Springer: Too Hot for TV, K-Rock and the Louvre Museum," Loehr said.

The Internet Gaming Station allows users to play games as a team, competing against computer enemies, or battle it out against one another.

"My son and I have two computers linked together at home, and we play together against the computer. A lot of people don't realize you can do this, but it's really a lot of fun," Loehr said.

There is also the opportunity to work with QuickTime Virtual Reality.

This technology allows the user to look at items from many different angles.
